"It is the dignity, determination and decent simplicity of the man that will live on for all of us. Whether it was watching a patented goal-scoring rush on TV while poised on a father's knee or listening to the seemingly endless ovation for the Rocket at the closing of the Montreal Forum, Maurice Richard left us with a special legacy."

The three flags on the Jewish Community Campus – the Maple Leaf, the Fleur-de-lis and Star of David – were at half-mast last week.

Concerns voiced in committee

Having returned from the Victoria Day break, MPs were back on the job in Ottawa. Last week saw the Foreign Affairs committee deal with Bill C-19.

This bill is intended to bring Canadian law into line with the provisions of the newly established International Criminal Court (ICC).

The ICC is intended to deal with war crimes, crimes against humanity and the like.

Without the passage of C-19, Canada would not be in a position to participate in the ICC. This enabling legislation is therefore important to the government, given that Canada was one of the principal proponents of the court in the first place.

Unfortunately, certain countries hostile to Israel sneaked a provision into the Rome Treaty (the agreement that gave birth to the ICC), one that would make it possible to try Israeli officials for facilitating the transfer of Jewish populations into the West Bank and Gaza.

Naturally, Israel and its supporters in the west are anxious that the ICC not be exploited to advance such base political interests; and here in Canada, Jewish groups have been lobbying the government to ensure that Canada moves to pre-empt the possibility that the ICC would be used in such a manner.

All of this sets the scene for the committee hearings last week. Canadian Jewish Congress, led by their legislative expert, Eric Vernon, and their legal counsel, Prof. Ed Morgan, were there. Noted legal researcher, Ken Narvey – who came to national attention during the years of the Deschenes Commission – was busy handing out documents that highlighted the amendments he proposed. Prof. Irwin Cotler, MP, with an amused smile on his face listened to all the testimony. Mark Berlin, the Justice Department legal eagle who is responsible for the legislation, was flitting between various officials. Even Shimon Fogel of the Canada Israel Committee deigned to saunter in and exchange a "smile and wink" with committee chair, Bill Graham.

In truth, there were enough Jews in that room to hold a respectable minyan.

The real message here is that it should be of some comfort to the Jewish community that it still has the capacity to access the system and make its views known on issues that are important to the communal agenda.

B'nai Brith honours Ottawa couple

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — For the first time in this city, a husband and wife have been jointly honoured by B'nai Brith Canada for their service to the community.

John and Shirley Westeinde, owners of the Westeinde Group of Companies, were recently presented with the B'nai Brith Award of Merit 2000 at a gala dinner at the Westin Hotel. More than 450 people paid tribute to the couple, who have made a mark on the Ottawa community for their contribution to the construction industry and for their many volunteer activities over the years.

Lawrence Hart, national president of B'nai Brith Canada, presented the award to the Westeindes. "Tonight we are especially proud," he said, "to pay tribute to two people who have played, and continue to play, a defining role in the Canadian business establishment. Their dedication to charitable causes has earned them recognition."

For 20 years, the Westeindes have worked side by side, successfully building the company they founded into a large and profitable enterprise and earning the respect and admiration of their associates and employees for their fairness and business ethics. In addition, both have worked hard on behalf of the community.

John Westeinde is a director of the Canadian Tulip Festival and chair of the Friendship Windmill Corporation, a charitable organization that is building a working windmill to commemorate the liberation of the Netherlands by the Canadian Armed Forces.

When he was six, he said, his family and others were liberated. "As a result of the liberation, a large number of Dutch immigrants came to Canada. I am so lucky, thanks to Canadians, to be here."

Shirley Westeinde, a former nurse, changed careers in 1978 to join her husband in business. She has worked tirelessly and been recognized with a number of awards for both her business and community involvement over the years.

"There are two reasons for the dinner this evening," she said, "and the most important is to raise funds for B'nai Brith Canada programs. The goal that is most important to me is to eradicate anti-Semitism and racism… With the help of [organizations] like B'nai Brith, we can ensure that Ottawa continues to be the greatest place to live and work."

Israeli Ambassador David Sultan, one of several ambassadors at the dinner, said, "The honourees of tonight, John and Shirley Westeinde, have succeeded in making a commendable combination of excelling in their professional life while excelling in service to their community in a deep and unselfish way to make it a better one. May you go from strength to strength."

The evening was chaired by Dr. Norman and Myrna Barwin.

Holocaust centre dedicated

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — The city's Jewish community participated in the recent dedication of the Freeman Family Foundation Holocaust Education Centre at the Asper Jewish Community Campus.

Financing for the centre was raised almost entirely from among Holocaust survivors and their families.

"When the campus opened in the summer of 1997, our centre wasn't part of it," said Barbara Goszer, the centre's chair.

"We were told there was no community money for us, but if we could raise the money ourselves, we would be given space in the building."

Goszer, a past chair of Winnipeg's Holocaust Awareness Committee, who was among a large group of Jewish war orphans directed to Winnipeg in the late 1940s, organized the group's fund-raising efforts.

"We did very well," she says. "Ninety-five percent of the money came from survivors, including many from out of town."

The major contributor, Hamilton businessman Zoltan Freeman, was among the orphans that came to Winnipeg, Goszer says, but he did not stay long before moving to Hamilton.

At the dedication, all contributors of $1,000 or more were honoured.

The centre is meant to fill a void in Holocaust education in Manitoba, said Goszer. It consists of photographs, a large map and other exhibits about the Holocaust. An adjoining reading room is named for the late father and son, Max and Irving Goldman.

The centre's purpose, Goszer said, is to educate students and other visitors about the Holocaust, and teach tolerance in general.

Ottawa Jewish community takes to the streets

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — They walked, they ran, and they raised money for two very worthy causes.

This year's Loblaws UJA Walkathon 2000, held in memory of the late Lawrence Greenberg with Loblaws as a major sponsor, will provide funds for the Tikvah Poverty Assistance Fund and for poverty assistance programs of the United Way.

Greenberg, a former president of the Ottawa Vaad Ha'Ir and longtime supporter of the annual Walkathon, was killed in a car accident several months ago.

When asked to lend her husband's name to the annual event, Lynda Greenberg agreed wholeheartedly. "I was moved and honoured," she said. "This was the event of the year for Lawrence in the Jewish community. I think what made it special for him was that…it was a bringing together of the community in a fun-filled way."

Greenberg was very active with the United Way, and his cousin, Stephen Greenberg, president of the Ottawa Vaad Ha'Ir, will carry on the tradition.

"I am humbled that I have been asked to take Lawrence's place on the board of the United Way and I have accepted," he said. "I know he would be very pleased that the funds raised today are going to two funds that were very close to his heart – the Tikvah Fund and the United Way."

Ottawa Mayor Jim Watson addressed the participants at the opening ceremonies, speaking fondly of the late Lawrence Greenberg. "I had the great honour of knowing Lawrence," he said. "I think this is a wonderful tribute to him. The entire community misses Lawrence's input. This keeps his memory and the wonderful work he did on this good earth alive."

Adding to the excitement this year was a team relay organized by husband and wife team Allan and Naomi Cracower. Each five-person team had to walk or run five kilometres and each member was asked to raise at least $36.

Younger members of the community took part relays that included potato sack races, watermelon eating and human pyramids.

Volunteers kept things running smoothly throughout the day. Molly Hersh and Judith Weinman, who were seated at the registration desk before 8 a.m., explained their dedication. "We wanted to give back to the community and this is a great way to do something."

It's hard not to love your mother-in-law

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Why are mothers-in-law the butt of so many jokes?

The situation is often so painful, the only relief you get is comic relief, says Irene Bloomstone, a lifestyle educator.

"A mother-in-law – daughter-in-law relationship is the story of two women struggling for the love of one man. The mother fears losing the love of her son, and the daughter-in-law is afraid she'll never get control. The man is the major player in the scenario. He has split loyalties, and there are often hostilities because of that," she said at a recent panel discussion sponsored by Hadassah WIZO Lev Zahav chapter.

The panel included Elise Kalles, vice-president and associate broker, Harvey Kalles Real Estate, and daughter-in-law Dana Rocket; Sharon Kroft, past president, Hadassah WIZO and daughter-in-law Marci Kroft; and Carol Seidman, national CEO, Canadian Breast Cancer Research Foundation, and mother-in-law, Shirley Seidman.

"We are all good wives and good mothers, but something happens when our sons get married. Just the title mother-in-law conjures up negative images," said Bloomstone.

There is a big difference in the relationship between mothers-in-law and daughters-in-law, and mothers-in-law and sons-in-law, she said. "The former relationship is often full of conflict, especially when the mother feels her daughter-in-law is not good enough for her son."

The onus is on a mother-in-law to have realistic expectations, she said. "Go easy on your advice so you don't sound like a critic. Allow the couple some privacy, and don't pressure them about anything. There are really no rules – only guidelines. Everyone is in a different situation."

Women should not argue with their son about who he chooses to marry, said Bloomstone, "and do not be quick to blame your daughter-in-law for various things. Try to grin and bear it."

Seidman, who has been married to Shirley's son Peter for 28 years, said that at the beginning of their marriage she always felt she could not live up to the expectations of her mother-in-law. "Over the years, however, I realized that my self-esteem did not depend on her approval, and today we are friends."

Mothers-in-law need to pause before they say anything, said Shirley, "and think about whether you would want anyone to talk to you in that tone of voice."

What can we do to present ourselves well as mothers-in-law? "Hopefully, there should be good thoughts, good words, good deeds. One of the big problems women have is that we tend to let our emotions override our rationale," said Bloomstone.

It is also up to the daughter-in-law to honour the older woman, she said.

"Be in tune with the needs of your mother-in-law. If she needs to be called mom, respect that and call her mom."

NYGH to get funding

TORONTO — The Leslie and Branson sites of North York General Hospital will receive $20.8 million in capital funding for restructuring, Minister of Health and Long-Term Care Elizabeth Witmer announced recently.

The funds represent the government's portion of new construction costs for both projects, she said.

The Leslie site will receive $19.1 million, which will help the hospital meet enhanced regional needs and serve more patients on an inpatient, outpatient and emergency basis.

The $1.7 million for the Branson site will be used to convert it to an ambulatory care centre, with a focus on services for seniors.

About Nutrition

By LISA WEINBERG

Q. There has been a lot of negative press around peanuts in past years; however, I was always under the impression that they are a healthful choice. Is this still believed to be true?

A. It is absolutely true. Peanuts are full of heart-healthy monounsaturated fat and are beneficial in raising HDL (good cholesterol levels). However, peanuts, like most nuts, are very high in calories and total fat, and therefore should be consumed in small amounts to prevent weight gain.

Q. I often hear that eggs are high in fat. I really enjoy poached eggs on toast for breakfast. Can you tell me exactly how much fat is in one egg.

A. Actually eggs are not that high in fat. One egg contains just under six grams of fat, about the same as can be found in a small chicken breast. Eggs are an excellent source of protein and can be enjoyed without fear. Eating them poached is an excellent way to save on any added fat from frying. If you are making a fried egg or omelet, use a non stick pan or cooking spray to eliminate a lot of fat and calories typically found in the butter added to the pan.

80% of settlers would be 'historic achievement': Barak

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Prime Minister Ehud Barak said last Friday that Israel should consider any agreement with the Palestinians whereby 80 percent of settlers remain under Israeli sovereignty as a historical achievement.

Speaking at Labour party headquarters, Barak addressed recent criticisms levelled against him, including those by Interior Minster Natan Sharansky.

"They say that [I am] going to evacuate 40,000 settlers," Barak said. "First and foremost, we have not evacuated anyone, and wait and see – maybe we will not have to evacuate anyone.

"However," he continued, "if we reach a situation whereby, either under a framework agreement or permanent status accord, 80 percent or more of the settlers in Judea and Samaria remain in an area recognized by the rest of the world as solely Israel's, under Israeli sovereignty, we will have accomplished an historic and unique achievement."

Barak added that he hoped there would be no attempt by the Palestinians to avoid the framework agreement.

Barak's speech reflected his election promise that the majority of settlers, but not necessarily of settlements, would remain under Israeli sovereignty if and when an agreement with the Palestinians is reached.

While Israel's prime minister discussed possible final status goals concerning Jewish settlers, the London-based, Arab language, Al Hayat newspaper reported on Saturday that Israeli negotiators in Stockholm talks had assented to the establishment of a Palestinian state.

Negotiators in the secret talks in Sweden agreed that Jerusalem will remain under Israeli sovereignty and that the majority of Palestinian refugees will not be allowed to return to their homes, Al Hayat wrote. According to this report, Stockholm agreements relating to major issues of Palestinian statehood, Jerusalem and refugees are still awaiting approval from Ehud Barak and PA Chairman Yasser Arafat.

Al Hayat reported that Israeli and PA negotiators reached agreements after nine rounds of talks in Stockholm. These include:

- Jerusalem: The city is to remain under Israeli sovereignty, and to be headed by an Israeli mayor. Largely autonomous Arab municipal mechanisms will be established in sections of east Jerusalem – these municipal frameworks will be connected to the PA in areas of education, infrastructure and health.
- Refugees: With no connection to UN Resolution 194, Israel has acknowledged the principle of family reunification, which could apply to 100,000 persons. Palestinian refugees now living in Lebanon will be divided into different categories – those slated to move to Israel or the PA in accord with the family unification principle,

Fears arise for Barak's safety

By NAOMI SEGAL
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — Israel has increased security for its prime minister after Jewish settlers warned that Ehud Barak risks assassination if he plans to give more land to the Palestinians.

Government officials warned settlers not to encourage the same kind of atmosphere that preceded the 1995 assassination of Yitzhak Rabin, when the former prime minister was vilified by right-wing nationalists.

Shlomo Riklin, a leader of the Second Generation group of young settlers, warned that Barak's "days could be numbered" if he uproots Jewish settlements in the West Bank and Gaza Strip. The group has set up outposts on West Bank hilltops to try to prevent land transfers to the Palestinians.

Barak said at Sunday's Cabinet meeting that while he respects the settlers' movement, no attack could stop the peace process.

Foreign Minister David Levy called on religious figures "to be careful in your remarks because you are spiritual leaders. Declarations which are dangerous could, God forbid, bring upon us another blow we cannot bear," Levy said.

He made the comment at a meeting with Jewish settler leaders, who were quick to denounce any incitement to violence.

"We will not support any development that will lead, God forbid, to any incitement to assassinate the prime minister or any other Israeli leaders," settler leader Pinchas Wallerstein told reporters in Jerusalem.

But, he added, "We unfortunately face a very difficult battle."

The settler leaders had asked to meet with Levy to clarify recent speculation that Barak had agreed to hand over up to 95 percent of the West Bank to the Palestinians.

Barak has denied the speculation.

U.S. Secretary of State Madeleine Albright was scheduled to arrive in the Middle East on Monday to try to advance Israeli-Palestinian talks as well as use her two-day visit to pave the way for a summit before the end of the month involving Barak, President Clinton and Palestinian Authority President Yasser Arafat.

Legislators counter court ruling

By JULIE WIENER
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

NEW YORK — A week after the Israeli Supreme Court ruled that women are entitled to read from the Torah and wear prayer shawls at the Western Wall, haredi lawmakers have initiated legislation that would send to prison for seven years any women who do just that.

Last week's ruling is also under attack from the Israeli government, with the state attorney preparing a request that the decision be reconsidered on grounds that alternative sites are available and a change could lead to friction.

The case concerns Women of the Wall, a group that has been fighting for over a decade for the right to gather for prayer services at Judaism's holiest site.

Although the group includes Conservative and Reform women, its services follow Orthodox liturgy and do not recite prayers requiring a minyan, defined by Orthodoxy as 10 men.

Under the May 22 ruling, the government was given six months to arrange for police protection for the women to pray at the Kotel (the Wall).

Currently, the group is not protected, and according to a 1989 law, women worshippers who read from the Torah there are subjected to a six-month prison sentence.

The opposition to the decision, especially from the government of Ehud Barak who needs his Orthodox coalition partners to support his peace efforts, is raising questions about whether the rules for the women will actually change.

While the ruling applies specifically to Women of the Wall, it could also have implications for the Reform and Conservative movements, both of which have petitioned unsuccessfully in the past for the right to hold egalitarian services at the Kotel.

The Conservative movement recently agreed to a compromise proposed by legislator Nahum Langental, a member of the National Religious Party, whereby Women of the Wall will hold services at Robinson's Arch, a site at the southern end of the Western Wall.

In the Knesset, two bills responding to the May 22 ruling passed preliminary hearings.

One, introduced by the United Torah Judaism party and passed by a 29-17 vote, imposes a seven-year prison sentence and monetary fine on women who wear prayer shawls, read from the Torah, blow a shofar or lay tfillin at the Western Wall.

Two bills before Knesset

The other, introduced by Shas and passed by 29-25, declares that one must behave at the Kotel and surrounding plaza as if in a synagogue. It prohibits various activities, such as holding public gatherings without prior permission, wearing immodest clothing, eating, drinking, smoking, sleeping, violating Shabbat or festivals, photographing for a fee and slaughtering animals.

Legislation in the Knesset must pass three readings before it becomes law.

Knesset member Avraham Ravitz of United Torah Judaism said that in introducing the bill, the haredi legislators were trying to convey the deep injury they felt the High Court ruling had inflicted.

He said the jail term was secondary.

In response, Knesset member Naomi Hazan of the left-wing Meretz party, introduced a counterbill to legislate free worship at the Western Wall.

Hazan accused the United Torah Jewish bill of equating Israel with fundamentalist Iran.

"The Western Wall belongs to all Jews, to men and women, to haredi, Orthodox, Conservative, Reform and even secular Jews who come to the wall to pray there every once in a while when they feel the need," Hazan told Israel Radio.

Reform and Conservative leaders and Women of the Wall activists in the United States and Canada joined Hazan in condemning the haredi parties' proposed legislation.

Rabbi Dow Marmur, spiritual leader of Holy Blossom Temple said, "It is ironic that Jews are imitating the ayatollahs of the world. Fanaticism makes you ape your worst enemies."

Rabbi Elyse Goldstein, director of Kolel: The Adult Centre for Liberal Jewish Learning, said the proposed legislation shows the extent to which the perceived threat of change from within is so powerful.

"Here is a group of dedicated committed Jewish women from across the denominational spectrum seeking more Jewish involvement and a deeper Jewish prayer experience, and another group is suggesting they should go to jail," she said.

Rabbi Dovid Schochet, president of Vaad Harabanim, the association of Orthodox rabbis in Southern Ontario said the "facts are, when women enter an Orthodox synagogue and go to where the men are standing, it makes it impossible for men to pray.

"[To make such a change] at the Wall, would make it impossible for Orthodox Jews to pray. The women, however, should not be imprisoned. There should be a mechanism in place to force the women to leave."

In related news, women who gathered at the Western Wall last week took it as a good sign that they were able to hold a prayer service without any major incident. Members of Women of the Wall say they are optimistic that the government will carry out the ruling that allows them to pray at the Wall.

The Week in Israel

May 29

• Israeli media reported that Syria acquired new 700-km range SCUD missiles from North Korea. The missiles are capable of hitting the main population centres in Israel.

• Prime Minister Ehud Barak risks being assassinated if he uproots Jewish communities in the West Bank and Gaza, a leader of one of the communities said. If Barak carries "out this dangerous plan, his days could be numbered," Shlomo Riklin said in a radio interview.

May 30

• Transportation Minister Yitzhak Mordechai resigned from the cabinet, but will continue to serve as a member of the Knesset.

May 31

• IDF troops accompanying a convoy of settlers in the Gaza Strip narrowly avoided a terrorist bombing. The convoy was making its way toward the community of Netzarim when the troops noticed a suspicious object on the road. They turned the convoy around before the bomb exploded. No one was hurt.

• Fifteen factories have found jobs for some 100 members of the former South Lebanese Army, the head of the Israel Manufacturer's Association said. Oded Tira said he expects more Israeli businesses to follow.

• Turkey agreed to a joint Israeli-U.S. request to monitor Iranian planes using Turkish airspace en route to Syria, Israel Radio reported. Israeli and U.S. officials filed their request in an attempt to prevent the transfer of Iranian weapons to Syria.

June 1

• Barak and U.S. President Bill Clinton discussed Israeli-Palestinian peace talks and prospects for reviving talks with Syria during their meeting in Lisbon.

• The government approved construction of another 76 housing units in the Golan Heights town of Katzrin.

Palestinians in Lebanon key issue for peace

By SHELDON KIRSHNER

Mideast Analysis

It was once an article of faith that Lebanon would be the second Arab country to make peace with Israel. Whatever credibility this theory had vanished when Jordan, following Egypt's 1979 lead, signed a peace treaty with Israel in 1995. Five years on, Lebanon is still in no position to decide its own fate, due to the fact that, as a protectorate of Syria, it lacks the freedom to conduct an independent foreign policy.

Yet even if Syria is factored out of the equation, an unlikely scenario in the foreseeable future, Lebanon will probably drive a hard bargain when it is finally ready to deal with Israel on a face-to-face basis.

Apart from Syrian interference, the toughest hurdle confronting the two countries in direct negotiations would be the presence of Palestinian refugees in Lebanon. Emile Lahoud, Lebanon's president, alluded to this difficulty recently in connection with Israel's withdrawal from its self-declared security zone in southern Lebanon. He warned that Lebanon would not guarantee Israel peace along its northern border until Israel seriously addressed the Palestinian refugee problem.

As far as Lebanon is concerned, this is an issue for Israel to solve at its own expense, since the refugees were originally inhabitants of Palestine. But, as Prime Minister Ehud Barak has repeatedly indicated, Israel will not absorb these Palestinians.

Consequently, Lebanon appears stuck with the refugees, as it has been since their displacement during the 1948 Arab-Israeli war.

By all accounts, 125,000 Palestinian Arabs, mainly from the coastal plain and the Galilee, fled to Lebanon. The Lebanese government has always regarded the Palestinians as temporary residents who should be repatriated to their former homes, the sooner the better.

Lebanon's attitude has not changed. It considers the Palestinians as an "implantation" who should be rooted out of its soil. As Fares Bouez, the foreign minister, put it in a newspaper interview recently: "Lebanon was never before, nor is it now capable of dealing with this large number of Palestinians. It is not right to try to resolve the Palestinian problem by creating a Lebanese one."

There are about 350,000 Palestinian refugees in Lebanon, comprising 10 percent of the population, and living in some 35 squalid camps administered by the United Nations Relief and Works Agency. All but approximately 60,000 of the Palestinians, mainly Christians, are stateless, bereft of citizenship and basic rights, barred from numerous professions, and required to obtain special permits even as menial labourers. Due to these onerous restrictions, the Palestinian Authority, headed by Yasser Arafat, has accused Lebanon of conducting a "policy of racial discrimination" against Palestinians in Lebanon. Oblivious to such charges, Lebanon has no intention of naturalizing the refugees.

Lebanon's hard line is a function of the delicate sectarian balance which prevails in Lebanon. The vast majority of Palestinians are Sunni Muslims, and if they become citizens, the balance between Lebanese Muslims (58 percent) and Christians (42 percent) would collapse and religious tensions would flare yet again. Mainstream politicians in Lebanon do not want to tinker with this potential political timebomb.

For the Lebanese Christians in particular, the conferral of citizenship on Palestinians would be a betrayal. During the second Lebanese civil war (1975-1991), the Palestinians, much to the Christians' fury, sided with the Muslims. The embattled Christians are not likely to forgive the Palestinians any time soon.

The Palestinians are also perceived as a destabilizing force. The Lebanese have not forgotten that the PLO, from the late 1960s to the early 1980s, provoked endless strife with Israel. Nor have they forgotten the 1985 "war of the camps," which pit the Palestinians against the Lebanese Shi'ite Amal militia.

Simmonds' take on 'starving actors' wins him award

By JOSEPH SERGE
Arts Editor

TORONTO — It's an old cliche that many actors are starving and desperate for work. Winnipeg-born actor and writer Benson Simmonds' take on this theme recently won him a Leo for best performance in a short drama.

The Leos are Vancouver's biggest film and television awards. Simmonds' film, Applaud or Die, a black comedy, was also nominated for best screenplay and best short drama.

"The award was great because acting is my passion," Simmonds said from Vancouver, a few days after winning the award. "Acting is the kind of thing that's in my blood and I can't push it aside, but I do tend to write as well."

In Applaud or Die, Simmonds plays a struggling actor determined to prove he can act. He accosts a woman on the street and forces her at gunpoint to watch him act. The many twists-and-turns in this 11-minute movie eventually lead to tragic consequences.

Simmonds, who wrote the screenplay, was in New York a few years ago when the idea came to him. "I remember thinking that if I don't get some acting work soon I'm going to mug someone and force them to watch me act," he said.

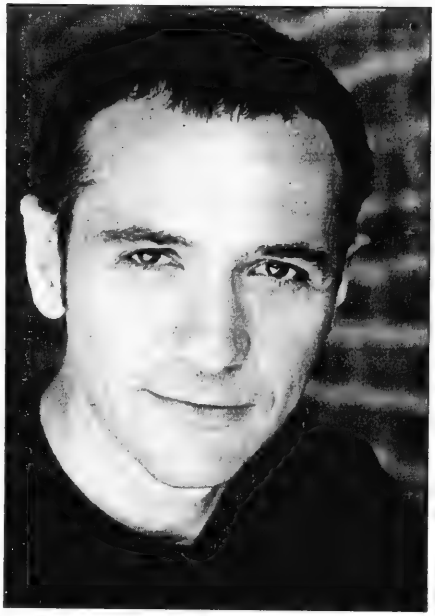
"I thought it was a funny idea and used it as a comic monologue in theatre before developing it as a screenplay."

Simmonds raised money for this film from his shul in Vancouver, Beth Hamidrash, donating 10 percent of the funds back to the shul's charity.

"Any profits, should we make any, would go back to the synagogue," he said. Simmonds also received financial backing from Toronto businessman Gerald Schwartz.

Simmonds, 40, has acted in many low-budget independent films, plus some TV films and movies. Although he enjoys starring in independent films, he would love to make it big.

"My goal with this film was to make a good film that would allow me to show my talent. I would really love to work with great directors like Martin Scorcese."



Benson Simmonds

He admits he's in a tough profession. Many great actors, he said, fall through the cracks waiting to be discovered.

"I think it's difficult for any actor to break through. The difficulty in this business is getting people to see your work. It's a wonderful business but it can be a very superficial one."

Until he achieves his breakthrough, which he's confident he will, Simmonds will continue to work on his own projects. His current one goes under the working title The Adventures of a Neurotic, Jewish Intellectual Action Hero.

"What I'm proud of is that if I can't find work, I'm going to make work for myself and others.

"If you have a vision, then with determination you can make it happen."

Applaud or Die will air on CBC's Canadian Reflections June 18 at 11:30 p.m.

Chazzanim delight audience with rich, varied repertoire

BY MORDECHAI BEN-DAT

TORONTO — After Lag b'Omer, the music and celebratory public performances return to the community's calendar like a burst of sun after many days of prolonged cloud.

Last week, the warm musical rays of sun shone very brightly as the post-Lag b'Omer season of song was inaugurated with the presentation by the Beth David B'nai Israel Beth Am Congregation in Toronto of the ninth annual Yom Yerushalayim Festive Concert of Song and Joy.

The main performers were a trio of talented chazzanim: Aaron Bensoussan of the Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda synagogue, Louis Danto, recently retired from Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda synagogue, and Yehuda Rottner of the hosting synagogue.

With distinctively contrasting voices and styles, the three chazzanim entertained the attentive and appreciative audience with a rich, varied repertoire of liturgy, ballad and popular song.

The much revered, "elder" and mentor of the trio, Louis Danto, sang in sure, steady tones in the bel canto voice that has been his longtime signature trademark.

His presentation was the most traditional. The mini-medley of Me'al Pisgat Har Hatsofim and Im Eshcecheich was particularly powerful, and the interplay with the choir in Retzei was an evocative, solid chanting of a familiar prayer from the Shmoneh Esrai.

The smooth and affable Rottner flexed his cantorial "muscle" with an inspiring rendition of Mipnei Chataeinu, of which the concluding crescendo stirred the audience to rousing chants of bravo. He also offered up a poignant pleading in the popular song Bring Him Home from the musical Les Miserables.

Bensoussan, was a virtual dynamo of physical and musical energy. Exhorting the audience with movements, gestures and musical flourishes to join in the emotions of the songs, he dared to cross more boldly into the non-traditional territory between chazzan and balladeer. And the audience responded with enthusiasm and favour.

The program featured three of his own compositions: D'ror Yikra, Shalom Aleichem and Ani Ma'amin, each an effusive, lively statement, capturing the almost sensuous joy of the Sephardi tradition.

The evening began with the joining of the three men's voices in a moving chassidic nigun entitled Yizkor. Introduced with the single, aching strain of a solo violin, the chazzanim then picked up the uncomplicated but haunting melody and worked it to a striking lament, and then joined by the choir and the keyboard, they transformed it into a rallying cry of harmony and inspiration.

In addition to the musical talents of the three chazzanim, the audience was treated to the mesmerizing basso profundo performance of Nicolai Tcherkasov who sang Gremin's aria from Eugene Onegin by Tchaikovsky, and to the controlled soprano singing of Ravel's unique version of Kaddish by Ramona Carmelly.

The performers were significantly aided during the evening by the accompaniment of The Muskat Symphony under the direction of Lyle Muskat.

The Beth David B'nai Israel Beth Am Choir lent its considerable musical weight to the concert as well. It was a musically rewarding evening.

The Toronto Heschel School, the arts-based, multi-sensory Jewish Day School, that has quickly established an international renown for its innovative, all-encompassing approach to Jewish education, last week presented An Evening of Sholom Aleichem.

Murray Horwitz, the gifted writer/actor/playwright performed marvelously. Culled from Aleichem's writings, the "storyline" touched upon the bittersweet experiences of the poor Kasrilevke Jew, whether engaged in the "ordinary" life of his village, visiting one of Rothschild bankers in Paris, or travelling in third-class car on the Russian railroad.

Perhaps the most poignant moment in the play was its finale, as Horwitz read from Aleichem's last will and testament.

The single person monologue was a demanding role. Yet Horwitz delivered a tender, moving portraiture of the life, times and works of the legendary Aleichem.

Film editor's documentary pays tribute to her mother

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Toronto film editor Valerie Weiss has ventured to the other side of the camera to write, produce, direct and edit her first independent documentary, Timepiece. Her protean talents have paid off handsomely, except for one irony: The film could have stood some more judicious editing.

Timepiece, which premiered June 3 at the National Film Board (150 John St.) is a dreamy, daring little film, barely an hour long, that is a study in juxtapositions. Weiss has recorded the oral Holocaust reminiscences of her mother, who includes the fate of her own parents. But instead of scripting all that over standard stock war-era footage, Weiss shows a collage of scratchy, 8-mm colour home movies taken by her vacationing parents and stark, black-and-white shots of her own modern-day Toronto.

It's a departure from what one might expect from a film whose script, at least, could have come straight out of an interview for Stephen Spielberg's Survivors of the Shoah Visual History project, which recorded thousands of survivor testimonies around the world.

In using visuals that stand in contrast to what we hear from her mother Susan Weiss, 35-year-old Valerie Weiss has created a disorienting atmosphere. The horrors of war-time Budapest we hear jar with grainy shots of happy people on a beach and shaky images of kids in a Toronto schoolyard. Past and present blur as the horror stories reach a crescendo. The incongruity is furthered by some truly spooky music composed by Donald Quan.

Susan Balkany Weiss was a young girl when the Nazis invaded Hungary in the spring of 1944. Jews were quickly stripped of their rights. That she escaped deportation to Auschwitz was a miracle.

Because she was hidden in a Budapest apartment building, sound became important to her; the slightest stir could have aroused suspicions; heavy footsteps were cause for panic. Her daughter plays on that; each mention of a slamming door or discomfiting noise is accompanied by well-timed visuals that limn the sounds.

The film is also a daughter's tribute to her mother, an attempt to understand her mother's experiences. According to Valerie Weiss, it's also supposed to show how the Holocaust continues to affect her own life, although that's not readily apparent.

And after about 40 minutes, we get the message. The film could have been much tighter. It was, however, "the toughest editing job I've ever done," Weiss says. "But it also taught me a lot. The whole experience really humbled me."

Running as a motif throughout Timepiece is the filmmaker's grandfather's pocket watch, which she has inherited. Like the timepiece, the Holocaust too is an inheritance, something that can be passed down to future generations.

Weiss has regarded her birthright from a different angle, but with deference.

Medina Ensemble presents three plays

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — When scenes from three famous plays are presented at Earl Bales Park Community Centre on June 15 at 7:30 p.m., it will bring special satisfaction to director Roselle Stone, a co-founder of Medina Theatre Ensemble.

In addition to viewing the performance on a pay what you can basis, the public is invited to the banquet hall of the centre to see the fruits of a workshop run by the veteran actor for the past three years.

This year Stone is directing scenes from Brighton Beach Memoirs by Neil Simon, The Doll's House by Henrik Ibsen and Second Time Around by Henry Denker.

This third annual presentation of Scenecraft Presents is a high-water mark for Stone who performed as an eight-year-old for Maurice Schwartz at the old Jewish Theatre on Spadina Avenue. Her parents took her to The Standard often and Stone, who sat in the front row, cried so lustily at Schwartz's histrionics that he cast her in a play later.

This began a career that saw her appear in several stage hits, in TV commercials and in movies with Sylvia Sydney and Shirley Maclaine.

The other Medina founders in 1982 were the late Ben Lennick and his wife Sylvia, Carol and Sid Libman, Fran Biderman Elliot, and Irving Hoffman. Medina has presented programs of full productions and dramatic readings for many organizations since then.

Some of the city's best known theatre personalities have been Medina's directors, speakers and teachers.

This time, the following members of Medina will take part in the June 15 presentation: Varda Shomromy, Joe Starr, Julie Clark, Marty Koven, Oscar Goodman, Susan Harssar, Trudi Deacon, Morris Jacobs, Eric Walton, Esther Rine, Lois Linett, Morris Nusyna, Mirabel Haneford, Fran Elliot, Charlene Zacks and Kay Sandy.

"Though these will be dramatic readings, the actors should deliver their lines in a way that the audience will think they are seeing a full production," Stone said.

One of the highlights of her long career, she said was writing a prize-winning short story awarded $200 and published by the Toronto Star to celebrate Toronto's sesquicentennial in 1983. It was based on her true experience of being sent to Kensington market by her mother to get Passover pickles.

JEWISH FILM SOCIETY SCREENS UNCLE MOSES

The Toronto Jewish Film Society screens the Yiddish film classic Uncle Moses June 11 at the Art Gallery of Ontario's Jackman Hall.

Rich sweatshop owner "Uncle" Moses is the opposite of his biblical counterpart. He brings his Polish landsmen from relative freedom in the shtetl to a life of hard work in his clothing factory in New York's Lower East Side. But when the workers form a union and his wife rebels, Moses discovers that "his people" need freedom.

Shlomo Schwartzberg of the Toronto Jewish Film Festival is scheduled to introduce the film, which stars Yiddish theatre great Maurice Schwartz. The short film Needle 'n Tread (1999) is also on the programme, which is being co-presented with Friends of Yiddish.

Screenings are at 5:15 and 7:45 p.m. Single tickets ($8) may be purchased at the door, 15 minutes before each screening. 416-924-6211.

NYC museums document Jewish history and tradition

By MYRIAM SHECHTER
Special to The CJN

NEW YORK — It has been said that you can find everything in New York.

Indeed, New York City has not only one, but two museums with Jewish content, which complement each other in appearance, exhibits and even location, giving the visitor a well-rounded look into Jewish life, history, traditions, art and culture.

The Jewish Museum, located on Fifth Avenue along Central Park, houses exhibits of painting and sculpture by Jewish artists, as well as various art objects from ancient and more recent Jewish history.

This exquisite chateau-style former residence of Felix M. Warburg, financier and leader of the Jewish community, has one of the world's largest collections of Jewish fine and ceremonial art.

The museum's permanent exhibition, Culture and Continuity: The Jewish Journey – reflecting Jewish culture and history through art, archeology, ceremonial objects, audio, video and interactive media – occupies the third and fourth floors, sharing them with a Resource Centre, the Children's Gallery and the Bronfman Education Centre.

I was especially intrigued by an interactive Talmud, where visitors enter debates with rabbis and scholars on various Jewish topics. I joined a lively computerized discussion on the Beginning of Life, which led to a debate on whether and when a fetus is "life."

The second floor houses a number of culturally significant temporary exhibits.

At the time of my visit, these were: Paris in New York – Jewish artists' work owned by private New York art collectors, featuring painting and sculpture by predominantly Eastern European Jews who were working in Paris, such as Chagall, Delaunay, Lipschitz, Modigliani, and others (through June 25); Anni Albers – the pre-eminent textile designer of the 20th century (through Aug. 20); Pickles and Pomegranates: Jewish Homes Near and Far – an interactive exhibition for children and families (through October 2000).

I concluded my visit with George Segal's powerful 1982 sculpture The Holocaust: an inmate stands behind barbed wire, the floor behind him strewn with corpses.

A chilly reminder of our recent history, it was a preparation for The Museum of Jewish Heritage: A Living Memorial to the Holocaust. This museum occupies a modern structure at the southern tip of Manhattan, in full view of the Statue of Liberty and Ellis Island. It focuses on the history of the Jewish people from about 1880 until present times.

The six-sided structure is organized in three sections: On the first floor, Jewish Life a Century Ago evokes the vitality and richness of the Jewish world from 1880 to about 1930. On the second floor, The War Against the Jews looks at the period of the Holocaust. Communities regrouping after the war and reviving their heritage and traditions are the focus of the third-floor exhibit Jewish Renewal.

Well-documented with images, artifacts and original films – mostly personal testimonies from Steven Spielberg's Survivors of the Shoah Visual History Foundation – the museum touches on universal themes, such as tradition, tragedy, joy, horror and the quest for human dignity.

At times, I could not look at the poignant exhibits, as I was trying to comprehend the incomprehensible (actually, the guide advises not to take children to some areas of the museum). However, it all came together when I looked through the guest book, where visitors from all around the world shared their impressions in English, Spanish, Russian, Hebrew and even Japanese.

Before leaving, I read the words engraved in the lobby of the museum, words which are at the heart of this living memorial to the Holocaust: "Remember… never forget," and just below that: "There is hope for your future." And I remembered the quote that I read in the uptown Jewish Museum: "Tell your children about it, and let your children tell theirs, and their children the next generations."

Actor glad audience can't throw tomatoes

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Actor Paul Braunstein relishes his role as a villain in the musical The Crimson Veil, but he's glad the theatre's rules don't allow the audience to throw rotten tomatoes at him.

"I do my best to prevent the hero from getting his true love, but in the end they succeed," he said.

The Crimson Veil, the last production of the Factory Theatre season runs from June 8 to July 9. It is directed by Leah Cherniak of Theatre Columbus.

Inspired by Italian folk tales, the musical by Canadian Allen Cole, may well remind its viewers of Shakespeare's A Midsummer Night's Dream and Romeo and Juliet.

The Crimson Veil is a romantic story of love in an enchanted forest filled with the magic of myth and the passion of mortals. It features four musicians.

Braunstein, 27, who plays the evil fairy Tick, is the son of Jeff Braunstein, 54, former actor and now president of Astirex Productions, and Maja Ardal, artistic director of Young People's Theatre for seven years, who now writes and acts.

A professional performer since the age of 18, Braunstein said, "This is the first time I've done a true musical and I find the role a great challenge."

Since he sings and plays the drums, he is well suited for a musical.

He played leading roles last year in Kilt at the Tarragon in Toronto and Picasso at the Lapin Agile in Victoria and Calgary.

Director identifies with his film's characters

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Almost a decade ago, when Paul Morrison was researching A Sense of Belonging, his documentary series about British Jews, he found himself at an exhibit at Cardiff's Welsh Folk Museum about now-defunct synagogues in the coal mining valleys of Wales.

"I loved the picture it conjured up for me, of these black-coated and bearded Lithuanian Jewish immigrants juxtaposed against the also hard-working, God-fearing chapel mining community," he said in an interview. "It seemed a juxtaposition pregnant with possibility."

And so the idea for Solomon and Gaenor, a film which opened in Toronto last week, was born.

Last year's Oscar nominee for best foreign film, Solomon and Gaenor concerns a doomed love affair in one of those isolated valleys. It is set in 1911 against the backdrop of the anti-Semitic Tredegar riots.

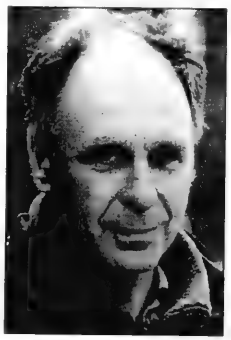
"Right from the beginning I intended it as a love story," explained Morrison, who wrote and directed the film. "I am married to someone non-Jewish, and this theme of cross-cultural love is close to my heart and experience. I never thought it would turn out quite as romantic as it did. Stories have their own way of taking us over as writers and directors."

Morrison, 55, filmed two versions of Solomon and Gaenor, one mainly in Welsh and one mostly in English, on an extremely tight budget.

Recalling the shoot, he said, "It rained a lot during the filming. Every shot lost through rain would be a shot I wouldn't be able to recoup elsewhere. There just wasn't the give in the schedule. But I had a great cast and crew, and there was a great spirit on the shoot, and all these problems were somehow overcome."

Asked about the Tredegar riots, Morrison said that, while they claimed no lives, they resulted in property damage.

"They were serious enough for Winston Churchill, then a young home secretary, to send in the troops. Nobody really knows what caused the riots, other than, as the film shows, the hardships of a long mining strike, and possible and untrue rumours of Jewish landlords raising rents. In fact, there were very few Jewish landlords. The main ones were the mine owners."



Paul Morrison

By his estimate, Wales was home to some 30,000 Jews, 3,000 in the valleys, in 1911.

"Today, there are scarcely any Jews left in the valleys. There is still a substantial community in Cardiff, but numbers are declining in the other towns."

As a result, synagogues have been sold and put to different uses. "The synagogue in Merthyr Tydfill is now a gym. The one in Pontypridd has been converted to flats. Sad."

Raised in London, Morrison can identify with the Jewish characters in Solomon and Gaenor, notably Issac and Rezl, who vehemently oppose their son Solomon's romance with a Welsh Baptist woman named Gaenor.

In Russia, Morrison's grandfathers on both sides were sign-writers. They immigrated to Britain in the early 20th century and owned photography businesses for awhile.

When business slacked off, Morrison's mother's father tried the fur trade, and when he went bankrupt, his wife set up what became a successful haberdashery shop in London's Camden Town district.

"That was most like Rezl and Isaac's shop in the movie. I always felt I knew what the Jewish side of the story was like. The challenge for me was to imagine the Welsh side."

Morrison, whose father was an architect and whose mother was a lecturer in art history, grew up in the shadow of anti-Semitism.

"My private school had a Jewish quota when I first went there. And there was quite a lot of more or less overt anti-Semitism. Looking back, though, what hurt most wasn't the swastikas on the walls or the fact that the Jewish kids got bullied, but the school's disinterest and unwillingness to acknowledge our Jewishness.

"It was as though being Jewish was somehow shameful and you didn't talk about it. This was the days before multiculturalism. It would be very different now."

Apart from being a filmmaker, Morrison is a practising psychotherapist. "The film world can be a pretty crazy one, and psychotherapy keeps me grounded and humble."

Morrison, who started as a documentary filmmaker, is working on several new projects: "One is about a Jewish kid growing up in south London in the 1950s who loves cricket, but isn't good at it. The first West Indian family moves in next door, throwing the family into turmoil. You have to guess what happens next."

Player of the year in U.S. college hockey league

Goaltender gets shot with NHL expansion team

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Someday in the distant future, when hockey fans gather over their favourite cold beverages to discuss the great game of hockey, Greg Gardner is likely to be the subject of a mind-bending trivia question.

As in, name the first player ever signed by the Columbus Blue Jackets.

By that time, the expansion Blue Jackets may well be as successful as the Edmonton Oilers, or as middling as the Carolina Hurricanes, but either way, Gardner's name in the club's history will be established.

On May 4, the Blue Jackets announced they had signed Gardner, "one of the most sought after college hockey players in North America."

They made Gardner, 24, their first ever selection after determining "he was the best college free agent goaltender available," said Doug MacLean, the club's general manager.

"Our scouts liked what they saw," MacLean told The CJN. "We are looking for depth and we think he can play in the NHL."

In four seasons with the Niagara University Purple Eagles, Gardner led the school from Division 2 and 3 competition into the NCAA Division 1, and to a first round victory in the 1999-00 NCAA Tournament.

In the season just ended, he won 29 of 41 games and registered a 1.53 goals against average – tops in the league – to go with a .936 save percentage. He also had 16 shutouts, shattering the 35-year record of eight set by Boston University's Jack Ferreira. He was named Player of the Year in College Hockey America (CHA), which is one of six NCAA Division 1 hockey conferences.

There's more. Gardner, a native of Mississauga, earned First Team All-CHA honours and won the league's Goaltender of the Year Award. He captured conference Player of the Week honours a league-high seven times. He was also named to the Team USA roster for the North American College Hockey Championships.

"Greg has all the physical skills to be a top-rank NHL goalie," said Niagara assistant coach Dave Burkholder. "He's really, really quick. He's a butterfly goaltender with unbelievable reflexes. He's a good game manager in the zone who knows when to freeze the puck to relieve pressure or to allow for a line change," Burkholder said. "I think his biggest strength is his maturity."

Greg Gardner shows the classic goaltending form that got him a contract with the Columbus Blue Jackets.

MacLean's scouting report on Gardner is that "he's quick. His focus is really strong, he's determined and we think he has a chance to play in the NHL."

The Blue Jackets will draft at least a couple of NHL veterans at season's end and "we anticipate Gardner starting in the minor leagues. We want him to play a lot and probably that will be in Syracuse (the team's minor league affiliate)," MacLean said.

For Gardner, who had nibbles from two other teams, playing in the NHL "is something every kid dreams about. I've now kind of moved from being a fan of the NHL to being a player in the NHL."

He's hired a personal trainer to get him in shape for training camp and he plans to hit the ice in August to scrimmage with local NHLers. He knows he's got to get his focus right to avoid being intimidated by the league's big shooters.

"As a rookie, you have to pretend they're just hockey players. They're more highly skilled but you can't be in awe of a Jaromir Jagr or a Steve Yzerman or a Mats Sundin. If you're in awe, you're in trouble," he said.

Gardner, who received a $500,000 U.S. signing bonus and a two-way contract, knows he may have to apprentice in Syracuse for a year before he gets a chance to start in the NHL. Nevertheless, it's a far cry from his situation of four years ago.

At that time he'd just finished an undistinguished minor league career in the Toronto area. He played for the Marlies for four years and suited up for the Mississauga Reps as a bantam and midget. At 17, he played for the Caledon Canadians Metro Junior A team until he was traded to the Thornhill Islanders. He was scouted by a number of U.S. colleges and chose to go to Niagara, which was launching its hockey program, where he was offered a full scholarship.

The move was key to his long term development. When he got to Niagara, "I was more of a puck stopper, using my instincts to prevent goals. I developed into more of a goaltender in Niagara, using better positioning, not letting out as many rebounds and calming myself down," he said.

Midway through his career with the Purple Eagles, he backstopped the gold medal-winning Canadian team at the Maccabiah Games in Israel. "That team could probably be a decent American Hockey League team," Gardner said. "We were really good."

Gardner, whose family are members of Solel Congregation in Mississauga, loved the experience in Israel. "It was unbelievable to be in Israel, to see Jerusalem and Tel Aviv, to see the Western Wall and to see where your roots come from."

His heritage is known; his future is yet to be written. Will he be no more than a trivia factoid or will he be one of the goaltenders long remembered for his exploits in the NHL?

BOURBON PECAN ROAST CHICKEN

1 3lb. chicken	freshly ground pepper	3-4 cloves garlic	1/2 cup broken pecans
1/2 fresh lemon	handful of dry tarragon	2-3 small peeled onions	1/2 cup bourbon
salt	1 tsp. rosemary	paprika

Wash the inside cavity and outside of chicken and pat dry. Rub cavity with cut side of half a lemon and sprinkle it with salt and pepper. Fill cavity with tarragon, rosemary, garlic cloves and onions. Truss and tie chicken. Pull up skin, press pecan bits into chicken breast and pull skin back into place. Pour 1/4 cup of bourbon over chicken and place it on its side in oven.

Roast for 20 minutes at 375-400°F, turn to other side, add remaining bourbon, baste and roast another 20 minutes. Turn again, baste and roast for a final 20 minutes., check to see if done. Servings: 6.

About Food

Dear Norene

By NORENE GILLETZ

Shavuot commemorates the giving of the Torah to the Jewish people at Mount Sinai and is also the Festival of the First Fruits (Chag Habikurim). The synagogue and home are decorated with flowers, plants and fruits. Dairy foods such as cheesecake and blintzes (which represent the shape of the Torah) are traditionally served.

Smaller individual cheesecakes baked in cupcake pans take less time to bake. You can also vary the fillings – e.g., chocolate, vanilla.

Substitute different liqueurs (orange, coffee, hazelnut, almond) for the vanilla. You can swirl melted semi-sweet chocolate into the batter.

Fresh berries make terrific toppings. For praline cheesecakes, use brown sugar instead of white; garnish with toasted pecan halves.

Short & Sweet (Sophisticated Desserts in No Time at All), Houghton Mifflin, contains 150 irresistible desserts. Each uses seven ingredients or less, and can be made in 30 minutes or less. The author, Melanie Barnard, streamlines preparations and simplifies techniques, cutting corners without sacrificing quality. You'll never have to go without dessert again!

Double this recipe and double your pleasure. Enjoy!

LITTLE CHEESECAKES

12 chocolate wafer cookies
8 ounces cream cheese, cut into 8 pieces, at room temperature
1/4 cup sugar
1 tsp. vanilla extract
1 large egg
1/2 cup (3 oz.) semisweet chocolate chips, melted (optional)

Preheat oven to 350. Line 6 to 8 (depending on depth) standard-sized cupcake cups with paper liners. Set a chocolate wafer in each cup. Crush remaining cookies in food processor, then remove from bowl and set aside. (No need to wash the bowl.)

Place cream cheese, sugar, vanilla and egg in processor; process just until smooth and fluffy, about 20 seconds. For chocolate cheesecakes, add melted chocolate and process just until blended.

Divide batter among the cups. For marble cheesecakes, pour some of the chocolate on top of each cheesecake, then use a table knife to swirl chocolate into batter.

Sprinkle cheesecakes with cookie crumbs. Bake until set and lightly coloured on top, about 20 minutes. Cool on a rack 5 minutes, then gently transfer cups to a baking sheet and set in the freezer at least 10 minutes before serving.

Cheesecakes can be refrigerated for up to 1 day. Makes 6 to 8 servings.

Envoy's term comes to an end

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

David Sultan

OTTAWA — Ambassador David Sultan and his wife Adina will soon be returning to their home in Jerusalem, as their four-year assignment in Canada comes to an end.

The Sultans arrived in Ottawa following a four-year posting in Egypt, Sultan's birthplace. The two assignments were vastly different, both politically and culturally, Sultan said.

"I knew that Canada is a friendly nation and that relations with Canada are important for us," Sultan said. "Other than that, I knew very little. In fact, when I arrived here, it was my first visit to Canada."

One thing that did not phase him was the weather. "I love the cold weather," he said. "I find it invigorating."

TORONTO — The Jewish Agency for Israel (JAFI) is seeking volunteer doctors and nurses for its third "mercy" mission to Ethiopia. The first mission arrived in Addis Ababa on May 24, and the second was due to leave from Israel in mid-June.

Each group stays in Ethiopia for three weeks, and the JAFI provides orientation,

Assad dead at 69

Quick takeover by son Bashar

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Hafez Assad, Syria's autocratic president who dreamed of Arab unity against Israel but watched his neighbours, one after the other, sign deals with the sworn enemy, died last Saturday.

The president, who was 69, had been suffering from heart trouble for some time and was also fighting lymphoma and kidney failure, according to a Lebanese heart surgeon close to the family. The surgeon said Assad died of heart failure.

In the first move to clear the ascension of Assad's 34-year-old son Bashar to the presidency, Parliament voted overwhelmingly to amend a constitutional article which requires the nation's head of state to be at least 40 years old. The legislators voted to lower the age to 34.

Assad, who took power in a bloodless coup in 1970, had been grooming Bashar for future leadership, but the British-educated ophthalmologist has held no major political office. Bashar had recently been taking a more prominent role in his father's regime, representing the nation abroad on official visits. At home, he has been waging an anti-corruption campaign. He was expected to be brought into the ruling Ba'ath party leadership at a congress to open June 17.

The News in Brief

CANADA

CJC on Museum Bill

OTTAWA — In its current form, a federal government bill whose aim is to build a free-standing museum dedicated to the Holocaust and human rights is "too broad and diffuse," Canadian Jewish Congress last week told a Commons standing committee on Canadian heritage. As it stands, Bill C-224 "would not lead to the end result we seek, which is the promotion of research and education about the importance of human rights as illustrated by the most documented and most extreme form of genocide of the 20th century," said Nate Leipciger, chair of CJC's Holocaust remembrance committee.

Petersons Honoured

LONDON — Former Ontario Premier David Peterson and his wife Shelley were honoured last week at the annual Jewish National Fund Negev Dinner, held at Or Shalom Synagogue.

Degree for Bronfman

TORONTO — Charles Bronfman, one of Canada's pre-eminent Jewish philanthropists, received an honorary doctor of laws degree at the University of Toronto's spring convocation held last week.

ISRAEL

Kidnapped Jews

JERUSALEM — Israel has presented Russian authorities with the names of eight Jews believed to have been kidnapped by Chechen gangs. The move followed the recent return to Israel of Adi Sharon, a 12-year-old boy held for 10 months before a Russian anti-terror unit rescued him.

Symbol Offer Rejected

JERUSALEM — Israel has rejected an offer from the International Committee of the Red Cross to include the Magen David Adom organization, provided it drop its Star of David emblem and adopt a neutral diamond symbol.

WORLD

Aussie Eruv

SYDNEY — Observant Jews here will soon be able to carry items and push strollers on the Sabbath after a local council approved the building of an eruv, or ritual boundary. The eruv is slated to be built in an area where 10 of Sydney's 18 Orthodox synagogues are located.

Jews Prefer Clinton

NEW YORK — Hillary Rodham Clinton would receive 49 percent of the Jewish vote in New York's Senate race if the election were held now, according to a new poll. Rep. Rick Lazio received 31 percent of respondents' support in the New York Daily News/New York Channel One poll. Overall, Clinton led Lazio by 46 to 42 percent in the survey of 1,001 voters.

Lawsuit Against Arafat

NEW YORK — Two American citizens have filed a lawsuit against Palestinian Authority President Yasser Arafat for their suffering during the 1985 hijacking of the cruise ship Achille Lauro. Sophie Chasser, 84, of Hollywood, Fla., and Ann Schneider, 87, of Great Neck, N.Y., seek $5 million in damages from Arafat and Mohammed Abu Abbas, who masterminded the hijacking.

Homes Defaced

JOHANNESBURG — Twelve houses in a predominantly Jewish suburb here were spray-painted with swastikas and other Nazi symbols. The homes of non-Jewish residents in the area were also targeted.

Queen Opens Exhibit

LONDON — Britain's first permanent memorial to the Holocaust was opened last week by Queen Elizabeth. The exhibit, which includes Holocaust-era artifacts as well as a deportation rail car and a model of a death camp, is housed in a $25.5-million extension of London's Imperial War Museum.

Day Sympathetic to Funding Burden

TORONTO — Canadian Alliance leadership hopeful Stockwell Day has assured parents that he is sympathetic to their quest for government funding of private and religious-based schools.

At a recent forum at Beth Jacob High School for Girls, Day told members of Ontario Parents for Equality in Education Funding (OPEEF), a multi-faith coalition, that tax dollars for private and independent schools "is not a political question. It's the right thing to do."

Despite the fact that education is within provincial jurisdictions, Day said fair funding could be accommodated by Canada's Constitution. It's an issue "the federal government has a proper role in addressing."

His solution is not direct funding but a tax credit for parents, one that would raise the basic tax exemption to $10,000 and increase the spousal exemption.

Day also noted last February's decision by the United Nations, which found Ontario discriminates against non-Catholics in education funding. "The UN has ruled that this is an area of religious discrimination," he said.

URGENT APPEAL TO HELP A FELLOW JEW BLINDED FOLLOWING A VICIOUS ATTACK

Mr. Vizel, father of 17 children, was the victim of a vicious, senseless, anti-semitic attack in New York, that left him with severe head injuries and totally blind. As a result of the attack, Mr. Vizel is no longer able to provide for his family who now have the daunting responsibility of caring for their permanently disabled father.

No one should ever know the tragedy and suffering the Vizel family has endured and continues to endure. This once self-sufficient family has been reduced to relying on the generosity of their Jewish brethren for a meagre existence.

We ask everyone to help them in whatever way possible. There can hardly be a greater or more worthy Charitable donation.

Is the old UJA system in trouble?

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Jewish philanthropy used to be much less complicated than it is today.

With trends like increased involvement on the part of donors in the way their money is spent and a growth in endowment gifts earmarked for specific projects, not to mention the tendency of some Jews to feel less connected than their parents to traditional Jewish charities, is the old United Jewish Appeal (UJA) system in trouble?

Special Feature
The Changing Nature of Philanthropy

In Toronto, UJA FEDERATION's annual campaign, which funds Jewish community needs locally and overseas, hasn't suffered. Last year it raised $41.5 million from a population base of about 175,000, but there is "a lot less blind faith than before," said Ted Sokolsky, vice-president of fund-raising for UJA FEDERATION of Greater Toronto, on a quiet Friday afternoon in his Lipa Green Building office.

Chad Wolfond

"When the issues [like the founding of the State of Israel] were life and death, people did sacrifice some of their own self-interest and felt that for the greater good, they would be more willing to throw their hat into the general pot. As these global Jewish issues become less self-evident, donors become more of a 'show-me' generation," Sokolsky said.

Sokolsky embraces the new challenges. "Every endowment director has a dream of raising millions and millions in unrestricted endowments. It just isn't happening any more, and that's okay. Actually I think it's better," he said.

"It keeps us on our toes. It helps us be more efficient and entrepreneurial. It forces us to be proactive and aware of community needs. If people were just dumping unrestricted dollars in our laps all the time, we could become lazy," he laughed.

Given the recent launch of Jewish Toronto Tomorrow (JTT) – a multi-faceted, ten-year plan designed to meet current and projected needs of the Toronto area's Jewish community – it's unlikely Sokolsky and his team of professionals and lay leaders will be accused of laziness. Earlier this year, in fact, he received the top fund-raising award given by United Jewish Communities, the umbrella for federations in North America.

Michael Steinhardt

Within the JTT umbrella, specific community projects are being "showcased," and people will choose what they want to support, Sokolsky said.

He believes that JTT will offer philanthropists the type of "visionary strategic projects" they may not have found thus far in the Jewish world.

In that respect, the project is an attempt to address issues that are more of a concern in the United States than here. "I think those trends – for example the incorporation of entrepreneurial strategies in a not-for profit world – are coming to Canada, but they haven't quite hit us yet," Sokolsky said.

Ted Sokolsky

Endowment gifts are a case in point. "It's only in the last two years that our government has given a break to donations of stock, and it's only a 50 percent break. But even with that, our endowment has quadrupled in the last two years, from $25 million to $100 million."

Still, Canadian philanthropies are "way behind" their American counterparts, he said. "They have much more supportive and proactive tax laws. In the States, if you give a gift of appreciated stock to charity, there's no capital gains. With the boom market over the last ten years, their public foundations have grown incredibly. There's been a long history of tax incentives to create foundations and endowments in the States."

Zac Kaye

Leslie Gales, 45, has recently taken a prominent role in the philanthropic world as co-chair of JTT's steering committee, notwithstanding a demanding career as an investment banker and a busy home life with two school-age children. "I really believe in what Jewish Toronto Tomorrow is all about," she said in a recent phone interview.

"I think all of us have the ability to give time and money. Giving, no matter at what level, is critical. I think if you're lucky enough to be exposed to the right match for who you are as a person, you get turned on. Just like life."

Leslie Gales

And from a purely financial view, Gales is equally enthusiastic. "You can create an endowment fund for $1,000. If you don't do it while you're alive, you can do it in your will. It's something forever. And $1,000 today – can you imagine what that will be worth 20 years from now? Or in 30 years? I think it will be amazing."

JTT offers donors the flexibility to "direct their gift in a manner compatible with the way they see the world," said Gales. "Before, we didn't have that flexibility."

The project reflects a desire on the part of donors for increased involvement, as well as the fact that the federation's role vis-à-vis fund-raising is changing.

Rabbi Baruch Frydman-Kohl

"The ends are still the same, but the means to the end are different," Sokolsky said.

He disagrees with people who accuse the federation of being too 'big, bureaucratic and overly centralized.' "We can turn that [criticism] around," he said.

"We have tremendous resources, a great knowledge base and we can provide

Young people, write!

Reverence for text – its exploration, its examination, its contemplation in all forms of study – is part of the deep structure of the Jewish character. We became that way, of course, because we attached ourselves to a holy text from the first moments of our existence as a free and freedom-loving people. The text gave us both purpose and identity; we gave the text both devotion and love.

Being obliged to read, and yearning for more and more things to read, we quickly learned how to write.

We have been writing ever since.

From the editor's desk

The CJN is therefore delighted to publish – as we have for the past few years – a sampling of some of the winning entries in the UJA FEDERATION Board of Jewish Education Creative Writing Contest.

Dancing with Miriam
by Miriam Gofine
Grade 5, Associated Hebrew Schools

I still remember that night…
The wind was blowing and the smell of sea water still clung to everybody's clothes.
A few hours ago we had finished crossing the Red Sea.

We were rejoicing, singing, dancing, praising the God who had led us out of slavery, opened up the waters of the sea, and had showed us so many miracles that before we had thought were impossible.

People were singing
I shall sing to Hashem for He has exalted above the arrogant, having hurled horse with its rider into the sea over and over again with all their hearts and souls.

Others were dancing with anybody they saw. I was dancing with her though.

She was the sister of our leader, Moses, and she was a Prophetess.

Everyone loved and cherished her.

She was also beautiful.

She had olive coloured skin and long wavy hair and eyes so dark they were almost black.

Then, I was so small and light that when my feet started to hurt she would pick me up and dance with me in the air and my feet dangling.

I was dancing with Miriam...

I will probably be sixty, but our Nation will have grown too

2000 is here so no more weapons
0r wars with people on this planet
52 years old, Israel is now
0h would we love to see peace.

My Family's Jewish Treasure
What Stories A Menorah Can Tell
by Claire Tobias
Grade 6, Bialik Hebrew Day School

My family's Jewish treasure
Swaying back and forth
Back and forth the boat was swaying
Crying, all around children were crying
Waiting, all around people were waiting
Waiting to hear what fate had been decided Silence, dead silence as the speaker came on Cheering, loud cheering from all around
Walking, walking off the boat
To a new world, a better world, a kinder world
Filled with hope and love
What stories a menorah can tell…

Out of the sack the menorah came
Lighting the room with all its splendour
Filling Jews all around with hope

Hope that one day the war would end
And peace would cover the earth once more
What stories a menorah can tell

Passed on from generation to generation
Waiting...for that one special holiday
The holiday of light and happiness and hope…
Lighting the room with glee and splendour…
What stories a menorah can tell
My family's Jewish treasure.

My Bubbie Speaks Yiddish

My bubbie
Loves me very much.
She says she loves me
A gans leiben.
She calls me a shane maidel.
She pats my bekalach
And she holds my hentee.
Before I go to bed
My bubbie kisses me on my kepee
And tells me to shloof gezint a hite.
I am her youngest ainekel.
Bubbie, I think YOU are very special
And I love you
A gans leiben too.

Rabbis, priests discuss marriage, intermarriage

By FRANCE KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — There were as many rabbis as there were priests at a recent meeting at the Catholic Pastoral Centre.

The half-day event that brought together 18 Conservative, Orthodox and Reform spiritual leaders with their Catholic counterparts was a meeting to discuss theology and practice related to marriage.

To the best of organizers' knowledge, it was the first formal event of its kind in Canada. It was the sixth in North America, following five in the United States that were facilitated, like this one, by Gunther Lawrence, executive director of the Interreligious Information Centre in New York.

"As a pastor and as a caring person, I need to be aware of the pain that intermarriage causes in the Jewish community," said Rev. Paul McGill of Holy Rosary Church, at a press conference following the event. "For me to blithely participate in interfaith marriages, I don't know that in conscience I can do that any more."

Currently, Catholics are permitted to marry non-Catholics under two conditions — that the union not jeopardize the faith and practice of the Catholic, and that all children be born and raised as Catholics, Rev. McGill explained.

Previous generations' attempts to discourage or forbid interfaith or interdenominational marriage often backfired, said Rev. McGill. "It left humongous chips on people's shoulders."

For Rev. Brian Clough, who has a Mississauga parish, the meeting brought home issues like children and "what was phrased as the December [Christmas-Chanukah] dilemma. In talking with a couple beforehand I can attempt to articulate these things."

Rabbi Baruch Frydman-Kohl of Beth Tzedec Congregation left with a greater awareness of Catholic theology in relation to marriage, as well as an appreciation of the affinities between some of the issues Catholics and Jews face.

But many interfaith couples bypass both church and synagogue, said the rabbi.

"The rates of interfaith marriages recorded by the diocese are exceptionally low, and no Reform, Conservative, Reconstructionist or Orthodox rabbi in this community officiates at intermarriages," he noted. "How do we find a way to speak to that group that doesn't come into our doors?"

Intermarriage is an issue for the Jewish community, in part, because the Jewish covenant with God is a "covenant in the flesh...as a consequence, we have to make sure that we have enough Jews for the future," explained Rabbi Frydman-Kohl. Rabbis also believe that a single-faith family has a better chance for stability, he added.

Often, said the rabbi, Jewish clergy deal with intermarriage after the fact. His synagogue recently inaugurated a group for parents of interfaith couples, but some intermarried couples also seek rabbinic counsel, he noted.

"We want to leave the door open for them to come back to us after they marry if there are things they need to talk through."

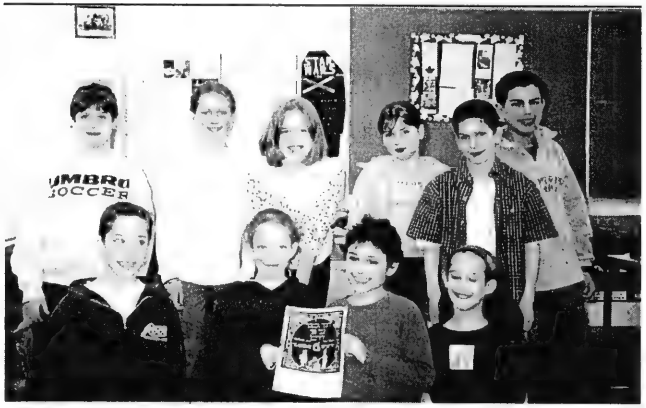
Couples are grateful when issues that may arise later are raised in premarital courses, Rabbi Frydman-Kohl has found.

Suzanne Scorsone, communications director of the Catholic Pastoral Centre, said engaged couples are very open to learning about themselves and each other in marriage preparation classes — despite being in love and having paid for the wedding flowers in advance.

"He thinks she's going to do all the housework, and she says, 'Excuse me?' There are couples who get these things worked out, and couples who bail," she said. "Interfaith really is an extension of something we're already doing."

The impending birth of a child, when families start asking about naming ceremonies, baptism or circumcision, often sparks an issue for an intermarried couple, who may have "inchoate" feelings about their own respective religions, said Rabbi Frydman-Kohl.

"We're not just concerned about preventing intermarriage because it's good for the Catholics or it's good for the Jews," said the rabbi. "We're concerned about the person in front of us."



TORAH-THON: Students at Ahavat Yisrael Hebrew School raised over $2,800 for Zareinu Educational Centre. They held a Torah-Thon, in which family and friends sponsored them to master facts in the Torah. The goal was to encourage both Torah study and community involvement. The Grade 5 class shown here raised the most money – $471. [Top row, from left,] Aubrey Cohen, Gillian Liebovitz, Sara Schwartz, Rebecca Rudson, Justin Rosen, Jason Bitton. UJA FEDERATION downsizes board of governors

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Judy Engel

TORONTO — UJA FEDERATION of Greater Toronto's board of governors was downsized from 120 members to 40, under a constitutional bylaw change passed at the organization's recent annual meeting.

Previously, the board – whose mandate was to approve allocations and advise the board of directors – was composed of 40 directors, 40 individual representatives to the Federation Council and 40 group representatives, explained federation president Alan Sandler.

Under the bylaw amendment, the board of governors will include specifically designated lay leaders including three young fund-raising leaders and one representative each from among the schools, agencies and synagogues. Its mandate will focus on making and integrating fund-raising policy.

In response to a question about the acceptability of having one representative for Reform, Conservative and Orthodox synagogues, Sandler said the only way to deal with the issue is "on a rotation basis." He also noted that issues can be addressed through the federation executive.

The number of governors must be kept down to "make it workable," said Sandler. The previous number "was just too large."

At the annual meeting, held at the Lipa Green building and attended by over 200 people, 13 volunteer recognition awards were presented:

• Judy Engel received the Phil Granovsky Award for Campaign Excellence, one of the community's most prestigious awards;

• David Beron and Miriam Rosenberg received Leadership Development awards;

• Shem Tov awards went to Bert Cohen of the Toronto Jewish Free Loan Cassa; Alex Gorlick of Circle of Care; Mark Jadd, Jewish Campus Services of Greater Toronto; Harvey Kotler, Bloor JCC; Tom Lebel, Bathurst Jewish Centre; Keith Ray, Kehilla Residential Program; Michael Rosenberg, UJA FEDERATION; Nancy Ruth; Board of Jewish Education; Jeff Wagman, B'nai Brith Youth Organization; and the late Ralph Snow, UJA FEDERATION.

Among the highlights of the year mentioned at the meeting was the launch of Jewish Toronto Tomorrow, which has received over $100 million in pledges.

This year's UJA FEDERATION campaign is aiming for $45 million, announced David Engel, Campaign 2000 co-chair and vice-chair for financial resource development. "The additional $4 million that we're asking the community to donate [beyond the $41.5 million raised last year] is based on the needs of children here, in Israel and in the former Soviet Union."

And in the end, what did he achieve?

After nearly three decades as ruler of Syria, although his title was president, Hafez al-Assad was removed from government by the only method his despot's mind understood and his despotic ways would allow: death. He was 69. Reports say he died of a heart attack, although he suffered from multiple ailments in the last days of his life.

In a masterful display of understatement, the New York Times obituary stated: "Mr. Assad's longevity in office rested on a rigid intolerance of dissent." (Our emphasis.) Assad's intolerance of dissent was so rigid in fact, that it snapped at the slightest swaying of any breeze of independent thinking or expression of individual rights on the part of Syrian citizenry.

Although the news services last weekend were filled with statements by world leaders who dutifully recalled Assad with terms of respect and mild praise, it is neither impertinent nor inappropriate to ask, truly, what did he achieve?

Some observers commended him for having brought political stability to a post-French colonial country wracked by countless military coups. But this is just a euphemism meaning he was the most ruthless of all. Some observers commended him for having built modern roads, schools and hospitals. But isn't this the very least that a government, even a despotic one, is expected to do?

In truth, the Assad record is a blood-soaked dossier of brutality and terror. From virtually the first moment he assumed power, he plotted against his neighbours. During the PLO-driven mayhem of 1970 he attempted to take over Jordan, but was prevented from doing so by Israel. His scheming against Iraq was constant, against Egypt only occasional but against the Palestinians, deadly. Lebanon is now nothing less than a Syrian protectorate. And against Israel, of course, hatred was the key determinant of his foreign policy. Syria still appears on the U.S. government list as one of the countries that sponsors terrorism.

But it was the plotting against his own people that inscribes the truest detail into the record. Assad's iron-fisted, "rigidly intolerant" rule has led Syria into the dark ages. Syria is an economic backwater. More interested in ensuring his family's rule than his people's progress, he spent the country's resources on the instruments of oppression rather than on the instruments of technology and self-sufficiency. He brutalized his own people: recall the tens of thousands he slaughtered in Hama and the Jews of Damascus, Aleppo and Kamishli whose lives he toyed with because they meant nothing to him.

Hafez Assad died as he lived, a tyrant, his life a testament to the deportment and destiny of all tyrants: paranoid, murderous, pitiless and ultimately, wasted.

Open discussion is vital

In your editorial of May 25, you record the vote of 56-48 in the Knesset to return the village of Abu Dis on the outskirts of Jerusalem, to be designated as the future capital of the nascent Palestinian state.

Even though in the days prior to the vote, a poll conducted on this very question yielded a 74 percent rejection by the Israeli public of this accommodation, the Knesset, made up of members unaccountable to their constituents, voted to transfer to a potential enemy this piece of territory that is within an artillery shell's range of the Knesset. Isn't it disgraceful that out of 120 members of the Knesset, 16 were absent on a day when a vote absolutely vital to the future security of the Jewish state was being taken?

As I write this, Israel has just completed its withdrawal from Lebanon, a tactical retreat the ramifications of which are yet to be felt. The country may be entering the most dangerous phase of its modern history. As we know all too well, the edge of the abyss is never far from the Jewish experience. Therefore, we should not muffle the truth in the cotton batten of polite wishful thinking. Engaging in an open discussion of Israel's options is our sacred duty.

Debating number of refugees

I was very surprised to read E.R. Drucker's letter (CJN, June 1), regarding the number of Arab Refugees from Palestine.

Most Israeli historians are in agreement by now as to the numbers involved. The first relevant information regarding the population in Palestine was given by the King-Crane commission in 1919. It stated the Arab population in Palestine was 555,000 (not including Palestinian Christians). Given the fact that this population grows at a rate which doubles the population every 20 years, the number of Arabs in Palestine in 1948 was around 1.25 million (which agrees with the British mandate estimates). After the 1948 war, there were fewer than 200,000 Arab Muslims under Israeli rule, which, when calculating the permanent residents of the Arab territories under Jordan and Egypt, shows the refugees numbered between 750,000 and 800,000.

Given the growth rate of their population, Drucker will easily find that the numbers do agree with more than 3.5 million Palestinian Arab refugees. As a former Israeli, I am offended by the tone of the writer, suggesting Israelis do not know the facts. We know them well, but we disagree as to what to do with them.

Explaining IDF draft policy

In his article titled "Israel's divisive draft policy" (CJN, May 25), Robert Sarner states: "More difficult is to figure out why the country's non-haredi majority has tolerated such a patently unjust situation."

The answer might be found in two areas.

First, the draft of the haredim is an emotional political issue, but in view of several statements made in the past by senior IDF officers, it does not seem to be a practical one. There are indications that the IDF is not really interested in drafting the haredim. In fact, it took some pressure to have the IDF accept the Hesder yeshiva system, which involves but an insignificant segment of the haredi youth.

Second, there is a growing tendency within the non-haredi, secular public to avoid military service. That issue has been the subject of numerous articles, discussions and investigations, under the heading of motivation to serve. The tendency to avoid service effects both the reserve and the draft.

The latest article about the subject appeared in the Ha'aretz magazine, May 26, titled "To serve or not to serve," by Uriya Shavit. It indicates that the IDF is fairly lenient in granting the wishes of those youngsters who do not want to be drafted.

Joseph Klinghofer — remarkable man

Since The CJN regrettably omitted an obituary story on the passing in late March of Dr. Joseph Klinghofer at the age of 97, I felt that his fascinating life and achievements should be provided for your readers.

Born in Radautz in Bukovina, he was not only immersed in shtetl life and Yiddish culture, but he was at home in at least half a dozen languages including Hebrew, Polish, Ukrainian, German, English, French, Italian and Romanian, as well as Greek and Latin. He worked for the Polish state school system and rose to be an inspector of high schools in language instruction.

In 1939, when the war threatened, he was in England attending an educational conference, and chose to return to Poland to be with his wife and rejoin his Polish regiment. He continued his teaching and was visited regularly by the KGB to test his political correctness.

When the Nazis struck, he went underground where he had two false identities and two names. As a teacher in an illegal underground Polish high school, he transcribed the nightly BBC broadcasts into Polish and covertly passed them to couriers of the Polish Resistance for distribution.

After the war, he was in a DP camp in Austria and eventually came to Canada, where his first job was as director of a Jewish Congress orphans' home at Harbord and Markham streets. His job for the next 22 years was educational director for the Canadian Jewish Congress, which involved inspecting Talmud Torahs in the communities of Ontario. He visited cities from Sarnia to Cornwall, in order to improve the level of Hebrew education there. Also, as director of research for the CJC, he produced a masterful study of 10 small Jewish communities as they were in the 1950s.

On his retirement in 1972, he maintained an unflagging interest in Jewish community affairs, attending all meetings of Congress, and was a faithful reader of Aufbau and Der Spiegel, as well as a large assortment of Hebrew papers. He was very actively involved in a myriad of activities, participating in mountain climbing and skiing until he was his 80s.

He leaves his wife, Gisela, and a son, Dr. Israel Irwin, named in honour of the State of Israel proclaimed in the year of his birth.

Truly a remarkable man, the late Dr. Joseph Klinghofer!

First go for power; then, peace

By ZE'EV SCHIFF
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

It doesn't matter whether the power struggle in Damascus culminates with Hafez al-Assad's son Bashar or someone else in control – the peace process between Israel and Syria will be frozen now for an indefinite period of time.

Whoever Assad's successor may be, he will have to focus his efforts at the start on consolidating his rule and ousting domestic opponents; and, under the circumstances, it is doubtful that he will take chances by pursuing a compromise agreement with Israel. He's sure to fear that such a move would be highly dangerous for him right now.

As reports circulated recently about Assad's poor health, the question of what comes next in Damascus engaged officials in Israel's security establishment. These officials pondered whether it was better to seek peace with an ailing Assad or to wait until a successor took up his mantle.

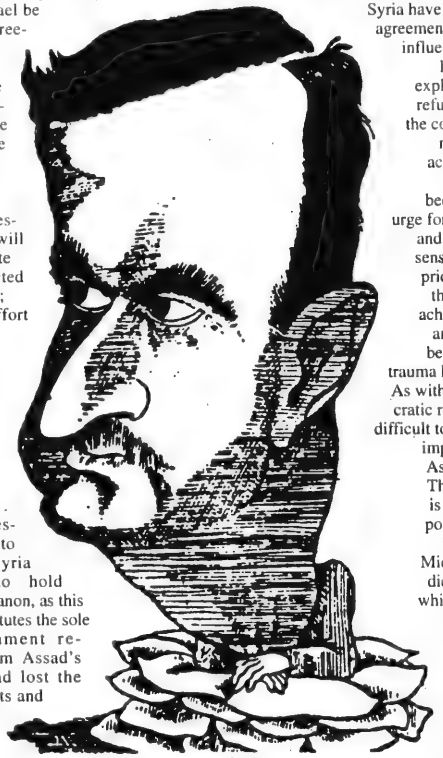
The assessment was that time will pass before Assad's replacement is able to free himself for peace negotiations – and it is possible that when he does so, he will have to adopt inflexible positions in order to display a tough nationalist approach befitting a new man in power. Thus, the prevailing view among Israel intelligence officials has been that it was better to seek peace with Assad and allow his successor to carry out what the infirm ruler agreed to.

The problem was that Assad adopted positions sufficiently rigid to scuttle attempts made by Ehud Barak (and Benjamin Netanyahu, Shimon Peres and Yitzhak Rabin before him) to reach an agreement, notwithstanding Israel's readiness to undertake major concessions. Assad made a first step, choosing peace with Israel as a strategic option; but he was inflexible when it came to the details of an agreement. Even if an Israeli prime minister had consented to Assad's demands, an agreement was liable to lose in a referendum. There is no assurance that Assad's son Bashar will be ready to make concessions about these details in a negotiation process.

Under present conditions, Israel must wait and refrain from intervening in events in Damascus. There is a chance that its manoeuvring space for contacts with the Syrians will improve. In any case, future developments in Syria are sure to influence affairs in Lebanon, and they will have an impact on Iran's role in the region, and perhaps also on Iraq's. This is a sweeping development, and Israel should respond by co-ordinating strategic steps with Washington.

The question of peace with Israel is not the cardinal issue facing Assad's successor. He will have to move to guarantee continued rule in Syria by the Alawite regime. This will be the top priority of any successor who shares Assad's ethnic ties. In this respect, the key problem is that some persons ousted recently by Bashar are also members of the Alawite community. Intelligence leaders and army commanders were among those deposed. This shake-up process has not been concluded; and therefore Bashar faces some very powerful enemies in the Damascus leadership.

Alawite commanders in Syria's army fear that their status will be further undermined should a peace agreement with Israel be forged. An agreement would mean slashes in the defence budget and reductions in the army; so these commanders have opposed peace. An Alawite successor to Assad will have to placate these disaffected army officers; and, in this effort to quell their dissent, he might find it important to reach an acceptable accommodation with the United States.



The successor will have to ensure that Syria continues to hold power in Lebanon, as this control constitutes the sole accomplishment remaining from Assad's tenure. Assad lost the Golan Heights and proved unable to restore it to his country. Nor was he able to swim in the Sea of Galilee, as he expected. In contrast, he managed to attain complete control in Lebanon, and have his rule there recognized in the Arab world and by some other countries around the globe.

Assad adopted tough positions and took steps with great caution. He generally refrained from directly provoking Israel via actions which left footprints that could be tracked directly to Damascus. His successor might prove to be less cautious while setting policy, and, as a result of inexperience, might make mistakes on the ground.

Question marks hang over Damascus

By UZI BENZIMAN
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

The death of Syrian President Hafez al-Assad takes from the stage the last of the leaders who were personally involved in the Six Day War and the Yom Kippur War, experienced the results of those wars, and shaped their attitudes toward Israel accordingly.

People considered experts on Syria have not been in agreement as to what influence this has had. Does it explain Assad's refusal to make the compromises necessary to achieve peace with Israel because of the urge for vengeance and a persistent sense of injured pride, or was it the key to the achievement of an agreement because of the trauma he suffered? As with other autocratic regimes, it is difficult to predict the implications of Assad's death. This difficulty is vastly compounded when it involves a Middle Eastern dictatorship in which the death of a leader, whether from natural causes or as a result of violence, is liable to change the face of reality entirely. Nonetheless, it would not appear too wrong to state, a short time after Assad's death has been made public, that the Middle East is now at a crossroads and that Israel is now facing uncertainty in its attempts to establish relations with Syria.

Only a month ago, the savants were quibbling over the question of the meaning of Assad's behaviour at his meeting with U.S. President Bill Clinton in Geneva. Some attributed the failure of the talks to incorrect preparation, some pinned the blame on the American ambassador in Damascus, some made Foreign Minister Farouk Shara the scapegoat for the debacle and some found medical explanations for the reversal that occurred, ostensibly, in Assad's position during the course of the talks he held with Clinton. Today, it turns out that he was definitely on the wane.

Though Assad's death was expected, his departure leaves Syria and its neighbours in a state of acute uncertainty. "The Middle East is not the Middle West," Likud MK Moshe Arens used to say when he was defence minister, using this to justify his tendency to maintain the status quo in the relations between Israel and its neighbours. And indeed, presumably the departure of the Syrian ruler will blow wind into the sails of the Israeli right, which warned against making any agreements with him on the grounds that an autocratic regime given to sudden changes cannot be trusted.

This approach, although it sounds convincing right now, such a short time after the signing of a peace agreement between Prime Minister Ehud Barak and Assad looked as if it were within reach, is not necessarily valid in every situation and in every Middle Eastern context.

'There may be cause for optimism'

In Egypt, President Hosni Mubarak followed Anwar Sadat, and Mubarak is honouring the peace agreement his predecessor signed with Menachem Begin. King Hussein of Jordan was followed by King Abdullah (contrary to the predictions that the heir would be Crown Prince Hassan), and he too is honouring the peace agreement his father signed with Israel. Thus it is best not to scorn the attempt Barak made to reach an agreement with Assad, despite the assessments regarding his poor health, or to hasten to criticize Israel's chances of reaching an agreement with Syria, no matter who the next ruler in Damascus may be.

Indeed, there may even be cause for optimism in this context. The new generation of leaders in the Middle East should be free of the ideological chains and psychological inhibitions of the previous generation.

This generation has grown up in the computer era, has been exposed to the modern conceptual world (some of the new leaders have even been educated in the west). There is the possibility, therefore, that this generation's basic approach in pursuing the welfare of its people will be different from the approach of its predecessors. And perhaps this is just naive musing that ignores the basic forces that are operative in autocratic Arab regimes. In any case, there is a big question mark hovering over Damascus, and it is keeping the eyes of Syria's neighbours wide open.

Opinions

Are we licensed to kill?

Since many readers of this column did not have a chance to see my recent article in the Globe and Mail, I have chosen to republish it here, albeit in a somewhat shortened version.

Rabbi Gunther Plaut in Toronto

The moment I read of the tragic accident that caused a woman to be dragged to her death by a driver unaware of what had happened, I knew that I and others like me were in for trouble. The headline in the Globe and Mail made sure its readers learned that the hapless driver of the car was 84 years old. No one else's age had been headlined in this fashion for as long as I can remember. Since then – and another tragedy involving an 82-year-old driver – catchy headlines and articles with carefully selected statistics have told us that older drivers in general are a menace.

I might have kept my peace in this growing atmosphere of fear-mongering, but a headline on April 18 was too much: "Aging Drivers — Licensed to Kill?" The caption was clearly inflammatory, even though it in no way reflected the tenor of the article by Emile Therien which, in contrast to its predecessors, was distinguished by its reasonable approach.

The latest campaign to stigmatize older drivers as people who are likely to lose their capacity to drive safely (or have lost it already) was another proof that ageism is alive and well in our society. Too bad that a respected newspaper joins the parade and makes it tougher for us to keep our self-respect.

Our critics think they know everything about us, and select statistics to beef up their "knowledge." How about the people whose statistics are likely to be the most thorough and sophisticated, the insurance companies? If older drivers were an insurance risk, insurance companies would be the first to raise our premiums, as they do for males under 25 years of age. Yet the companies seem to be unconcerned, even though their money is at stake. If we were as unsafe on the road as our critics assert, our premiums would have risen long ago.

I do not oppose driving tests for me or my contemporaries, as long as everyone else is also tested at regular intervals. I want to be judged by my personal ability or inability to perform, and not by my chronological age.

I want the greatest safety for all people on the road, and I shall be happy to comply with a measured program that is fair and treats me as an individual and not as a member of that part of the population that already suffers too much distrust, dislike and discrimination.

After Lebanon

The "new Middle East" emerging after Lebanon may seem like a harsh version of the utopia promised by Shimon Peres several years ago – but it is new. The unilateral withdrawal of Israeli troops has redrawn the map of the Middle East and has sharpened the debate inside Israel over the limitations of power and the nature of security in the 21st century.

Shira Herzog in Toronto

Three aspects of this new reality are worth noting:

Events in Lebanon and Syria: For the last two decades, Lebanon's indigenous instability was seen internationally as a product of Israel's presence in the south. With Israel out, and with its challenge to the United Nations to ensure stability there, Lebanon's real problems are thrown into sharp relief. Hezbollah will now be tested, as will its Syrian patron.

Syria's interest in a heated Lebanese-Israeli border will be the new variable in the Israeli-Syrian equation. Hafez al-Assad hopes to pressure Israel back to the negotiating table through Hezbollah's actions. With a quiet border with Lebanon as well as on the Golan, Israel has no immediate need to talk to Assad given his unacceptable conditions on the water issue. It will take time for all sides to set the new rules of the game and until then, skirmishes and appropriate reactions can be expected.

The psychology of withdrawal: Israelis' grimaces at the sight of their soldiers retreating, with jubilant Lebanese and Hezbollah literally chasing them out, quickly gave way to a palpable, national sigh of relief. Ironically, the one war over which there was never a consensus resulted 20 years later in a unilateral withdrawal over which there was a consensus. An action that would have been unheard of in a past marked by attachment to myth and heroism (even if occasionally misplaced) was now undertaken with little dissent. This is a seminal moment in Israel's history and psychology. Like the 1973 Yom Kippur War, the 1982 Lebanon War itself, and the Palestinian intifadah of 1986, the withdrawal from Lebanon is yet another acknowledgement of the limitations of military power and the new definitions of security that are required.

All of this has an impact on the second, critical element of the "new Middle East" that is emerging. In negotiations with the Palestinians, Israelis will have to draw the appropriate lines around borders, settlements and Jerusalem. And in spite of what Hezbollah and other Arab parties may want to believe, Lebanon is not really a precedent. The issues, the territorial aspect, and the psychology of the conflict and the Israeli internal debate – are all different. Those negotiations will succeed or fail because of inherent difficulties that can or cannot be resolved, and not because Israel has lost its nerve.

Ehud Barak's leadership: For the first time in months, Barak seems not only self-confident, but in charge. He has delivered on a critical election promise that was a key element in his victory one year ago. He has always seen his task as guiding his state and people through a national transition comparable only to the challenge that faced Israel's founding prime minister, David Ben-Gurion. Barak has a keen sense of history, destiny and responsibility. He is conscious of the challenge of Jewish sovereignty in what is still a new national experiment, and he is concerned about the recurring theme of fractiousness and militant divisiveness throughout Jewish history.

In interviews on the first anniversary of his victory, Barak spoke realistically about peace with Israel's neighbours. He believes that the combination of Israel's massive power and the strategic window of opportunity created in the aftermath of the Soviet collapse still militate towards peace treaties in the region. But he is acutely conscious of the difficulties of coexisting in a region marked by atavistic conflicts that have nothing in common with the modern world. Reconciliation with Israel, Barak says, is more likely to be the result of treaties than a precursor to them.

A month before he ordered his troops out of Lebanon, Barak said: "If we build the state of Israel on the assumption that without a security zone in a neighbouring state we have no security, then we have created a formula of reliance on the sword forever. The decision is ultimately mine, and if there will be problems, I will be held responsible."

Venturing out of the ivory tower

Professors and researchers in the areas of Jewish studies have long had to wrestle with the tension between objective scholarship and subjective commitments.

Morton Weinfeld in Montreal

Early on, Jewish studies sought to wrest the study of Judaica from departments of religion or divinity. The scientific study of religion has a long and distinguished pedigree. It takes pains to differentiate its enterprise from that of clerics who see scripture as the Divine word of God. The early scholars of Judaica in Europe and North America tried to distance their work from apparent Orthodox interpretations. Some were in fact resolutely secular. There has been a creative tension between the scientific and more traditional approaches to the study of Bible, Talmud, and Jewish thought.

Over the years, the field of Jewish studies broadened to include all of Jewish history, languages and literature, philosophy and social studies of Jewish life. More recently there have been increases in specialty areas, such as the Holocaust or Israel studies. Many of the topics studied in these areas are controversial, some tinged with ideology.

As Jewish philanthropists have endowed numerous Chairs, departments and programs of Jewish studies in universities, one can wonder whether there are any intellectual or communal strings attached. Should professors of Jewish studies be role models for Jewish students? Do they have to be cheerleaders for the Jewish community or the Jewish experience? How critical can they be of aspects of Jewish life or community? And what is the role of non-Jews in the field?

My theoretical position is that professors of Jewish studies do not have to be Jewish, or even personally committed to Jewish life, the Jewish community, or Jewish continuity, or to a specific vision in those areas. But that is theory.

In the real world, the fact is that the vast majority of scholars and students in these areas are Jewish, most with an extensive personal Jewish background and with strong Jewish commitments. I periodically attend meetings of the Association of Jewish Studies in Boston, and the annual meetings of the Association for Canadian Jewish Studies. This year the ACJS met in Edmonton, where other Canadian scientific meetings were held.

These Jewish meetings are not strictly academic; they have a warm, intimate, communal feel to them that is not purely professional or scientific. The ACJS makes a habit of linking its academic program to the local Jewish community, often holding one day sessions at a synagogue, where feasible. Some might feel this violates strict academic canons of objectivity. Perhaps it does. But there is more than one model of the academic mission.

Why must academics remain in their ivory tower, cut off from the community? Too often, contemporary academics hide behind the latest jargon and faddish ideological posturing, presenting papers and research that are incomprehensible to interested lay people (and to many other scholars) and out of touch with their concerns.

The regular interaction between the researchers involved in the ACJS and members of the local community enriches both. And there is no shortage of critical analyses that are presented. The ACJS is open to anyone seeking to join. It is to be commended for blurring the artificial boundaries between the professional and amateur scholars of contemporary Jewish life.

What amateurs may lack in professional training they can make up in passion for the subject and in original insight unfetted by academic conventional wisdom. Certainly, the growing field of Canadian Jewish studies has benefited from these annual contacts with Jewish communities from coast to

The Kirshner File

A cornucopia of books...

As Rene Descartes, the 17th-century French philosopher and mathematician, put it, "The reading of good books is like a conversation with the best men of past centuries..." In this spirit, I'll review some of the newly-published books which have crossed my desk lately.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

Under the category of Diaspora Jewry, let's start with The Jews of Modern France (University of California Press) by Paula Hyman and with The Jews of France (Princeton University Press) by Esther Benbassa. These are important and impressive works of scholarship, as are Jews in the Mediterranean Diaspora (California) by John Barclay and The Jews of Egypt: From Ramses II to Emperor Hadrian (Princeton) by Joseph Modrzejewski.

Hagar Salamon's The Hyena People: Ethiopian Jews in Christian Ethiopia (California) is a fascinating anthropological study, while Stan Mack's The Story of the Jews (Random House) is a pictorial journey across 4,000 years of Jewish history. Crisis and Creativity in the Sephardi World, 1391-1648 (Columbia University Press), edited by Benjamin Gampel, consists of 15 scholarly essays on topics ranging from Marrano ethnicity to Hebrew manuscripts after the expulsion of Jews from Spain.

In Anne Frank (Fitzhenry & Whiteside), Melissa Muller has written a nuanced biography of this vivacious Dutch diarist. And in The Visible Wall (Southern Illinois University Press), Rochelle Wright presents an illuminating analysis of how Jews, among other "ethnic outsiders," have been portrayed in Swedish cinema. Anthony Julius' penetrating book, T.S. Eliot and Anti-Semitism (Cambridge University Press), is well worth reading.

T. S. Eliot

The last volume in Stephen Birmingham's trilogy, The Rest of Us (Syracuse University Press) charts the rise of East European Jews in American society. American Jewish Desk Reference (Random House) is a first-rate account of the Jewish experience in the United States, with emphasis on biographies. The perfect companion volume is American Chronicle (Yale University Press), a beautifully-researched compilation of the 20th century.

In Jacob Adler: A Life on the Stage (Alfred A. Knopf), Lulla Rosenfeld has produced a fine biography of a great actor. Isaac Stern, My First 79 Years (Random House), is a mix of reminiscence and commentary written in cooperation with novelist Chaim Potok. The Journey Home (Schocken), by Joyce Antler, recounts the lives of accomplished American Jewish women, from Emma Goldman to Gertrude Stein, who have made a difference. In Pray Ball (Gefen), a mosaic of morally-uplifting essays, Rabbi James Gordon argues that sports can reinforce virtues like fairness and respect.

A Concise Companion to the Jewish Religion (Oxford), by Louis Jacobs, is reasonably comprehensive. Jonathan Kirsch separates fact from fiction in Moses: A Life (Random House). Paula Fredriksen, in Jesus of Nazareth, King of the Jews (Random House), draws on many sources to flesh out a portrait of a seminal biblical figure. The Bible As It Was (Harvard University Press) illuminates the Old Testament. Hershel Shanks' The Mystery and Meaning of the Dead Sea Scrolls (Random House) is a reflective meditation of their historical significance.

Paul Mendes-Flohr, in German Jews: A Dual Identity (Yale), contends that Jews assimilated German cultural values without necessarily assimilating into German society. Masterfully blending history with biography, the historian Fritz Stern explores a similar theme in Einstein's German World (Princeton). And in The Renaissance of Jewish Culture in Weimar Germany (Yale), Michael Brenner also looks at this intriguing subject.

The first volume of Saul Friedlander's Nazi Germany and the Jews (HarperCollins) is a skillful amalgam of scholarship and popular history. Marion Kaplan's Between Dignity and Despair (Oxford University Press) skillfully focuses on the fate of Jewish women in the Third Reich.

In Denmark It Could Not Happen (Gefen), Herbert Pundik writes of the miraculous rescue of Danish Jewry during the Nazi occupation.

And in Man of Ashes (University of Nebraska Press), Salomon Isacovici, a Romanian Jew uprooted from his home by the Nazis, recounts his harrowing experiences. Ruth Karp, a Jewish girl from France, lived through the Holocaust thanks to the help she received from ordinary French citizens. Stacy Cretzmeyer, in Your Name is Renee (Oxford), tells her tale of survival. Irene Gut, a Polish Catholic, hid 12 Jews in the basement of a German officer's home. In My Hands (Random House), a gripping work, she tells an amazing story.

Anne Frank

Emile Schindler, the widow of Oskar Schindler, is an unsung heroine, and in Where Light and Shadow Meet (W.W. Norton), she recalls her war years and her tumultuous marriage to this ethically ambiguous man.

Kate Cohen, in The Neppi Modona Diaries (University Press of New England), painstakingly reconstructs the lives of a pro-fascist Jewish family in Mussolini's Italy. And in Hannah Arendt Martin Heidegger (Yale), Elzbieta Ettinger tells of the strange affair between the Jewish philosopher and her pro-Nazi lover.

The concentration camp was a laboratory of cruelty resting on a foundation of violence. In The Order of Terror (Princeton), German sociologist Wolfgang Sofsky dissects this diabolical system.

Walter Laqueur's book, The Terrible Secret (Fitzhenry & Whiteside), a brilliant account of how information about the Holocaust was leaked to the world, was originally published in 1980. In the paperback edition, he adds a new introduction. Among those outraged by Germany's genocidal policies were members of the ineffectual German resistance movement, the topic of Theodore Hamerow's thoroughly documented study, On The Road To The Wolf's Lair (Harvard). If this topic interests you, I would recommend American Intelligence and the German Resistance to Hitler (Westview Press), edited by Jurgen Heidking and Christof Mauch. The most fanatical Nazis belonged to the Werewolfs, a group dedicated to stopping the advance of the Allies in 1945. Perry Biddiscombe deftly analyzes this malevolent movement in Werewolf! (University of Toronto Press).

After all is said and done, how can one make sense of the Nazi era? The following books will certainly help: Where Ghosts Walked (W.W. Norton), David Clay Larges' knowing narrative of the cultural roots of Nazism; Life Unworthy of Life (HarperCollins), James Glass' trenchant examination of why ordinary Germans participated in the Final Solution; Germans Into Nazis (Harvard), Peter Fritzsche's extended essay on the Nazis' popularity; Hitler's Professors (Yale), Max Weinreich's erudite examination of the role leading scholars played in his rise to power; Death of Medicine In Nazi Germany (Madison Books), Wolfgang Weyers' disturbing account of the breakdown of medical ethics in a supposedly civilized country; Sonderstab Musik (University of Michigan Press), Willem de Vries' perceptive history of the Nazis' music policy.

Nazi Germany had a secret nuclear weapons program, and in Vengeance (Oxford) and Blood and Water (Henry Holt), Philip Henshall and Dan Kurzman respectively shed considerable light on this project. Sol Littman's book, War Criminal on Trial (Key Porter), is the definitive work on the Helmut Rauca case in Canada. Originally published in 1983, the softcover edition has been enlarged and revised.

Jewish Life

Judaism and strands of our hair

By RACHAEL TURKIENICZ

Midrashic Moments

In the Torah readings this month we learn of the laws of the Nazirite. If someone takes a vow to dedicate themselves to their spirituality and to God in an exclusive way, this person is termed a Nazirite.

According to the Torah, the vow must be bound by time, it must have a beginning and an end date. In other words, it cannot extend indefinitely but must be understood at the outset as a temporary status.

During this time, the person must abstain from drinking any fermented drinks and must guard against encountering any circumstance of death. Among the restrictions enforced on a Nazirite is the restriction to not cut the hair. A Nazirite must not have a haircut for the duration of the vow period. But how is hair symbolic of a Jewish spiritual journey?

In several instances a prohibition concerning the cutting of hair appears in the Jewish life cycle. Some cases are halachic in nature while others are traditional. When Jews mourn a close family relative, they are forbidden to cut their hair or shave.

While this prohibition speaks of encountering death, there is likewise a tradition connected to hair that speaks of new life.

When a Jewish child is born it is traditional not to cut the child's hair for the first three years. There are several traditional reasons for this prohibition. Some of the reasons have to do with the notion of "first fruits." When a tree first bears fruit we must not harvest the fruit for three years.

There is another tradition that speaks of d'mut Yehudi, the image of a Jew. The child must be allowed to establish itself as a new being and grow strong before we impose an external image upon it. Although born a Jew, the child must mature into that Jewish identity in stages.

Cutting the hair is a ritual imposed on us by our society and we comply in order to publicly state that we belong to our society. As children, our first three years of life are spent in the close quarters of our families and God. We are not yet ready to enter the Jewish community as contributing individuals.

For three years our hair grows wild and our souls grow freely, both untethered by societal obligations. After three years our hair is cut and the image of a Jew begins to manifest itself upon us. From that moment on, our parents help us mature into Jewish adults. At bar and bat mitzvah we are presented to the community as contributing adults ready to engage in Jewish communal issues.

When we refrain from cutting our hair we symbolically pull away from the community. Jewish children are sheltered at home for three years. The mourner and the Nazirite both pull away. They all allow their hair to grow unkempt.

The Jewish soul permeates our being, filling every heartbeat even to the strands of our hair. It is yet another reminder that Judaism is not just what we do, it is what we are.

Beyond stereotype images

By FRANCI WILLIAMS

Guest Voice

Lately, I have been reminded of the two most common Jewish female stereotypes: Jewish mothers (Yiddishe mamas) and Jewish daughters, the Jewish American princess or JAP.

References to the Jewish American princess appeared in Michael Posner's interview with Naomi Klein. (the Globe and Mail's book section, Jan. 15), where he writes: "Naomi Klein insists that...she was a socially apathetic teenager and a classic Jewish American princess."

I wonder if this implies that Klein evolved from a JAP to her present status as a socially aware person? What does JAP mean in this context and how does this term preclude any representation of the Jewish woman as a textured, multifaceted human being?

In Michaella Etienne's article in Afterword, Canada's National Jewish Student Newspaper (Spring 2000 Issue 7), she spots Jerry Seinfeld and his new bride in a cinema in New York. Having never met the woman, she writes: "His bride was a respectful looking JAP who caressed him in a way that showed other females her prized possession."

How many assumptions went into this opinion? This tells us more about the view of the author than it does about Mrs. Seinfeld.

It seems that it has become so acceptable to mock young Jewish women that such mockery is even considered politically correct. Doesn't this tell us how thoroughly internalized the image is?

However, the damage and disrespect inflicted on Jewish women by this stereotyping are very serious indeed. Furthermore, it would seem that such a one-dimensional caricature has such a negative influence on Jewish men: Some hold very negative attitudes towards Jewish women and avoid dating them.

The stereotyping also influences women who may view other Jewish women as objects of ridicule.

More importantly, the use of the term JAP may prevent us, as a community, from appreciating the accomplishments of Jewish female leaders and heroes, among them, scholars, artists, activists and innovators of social change. Further, the term JAP may block our awareness of the suffering of Jewish women in need – the elderly, the poor, the battered and the alcoholic.

Similar to the potentially destructive impact of the term JAP is the stereotype image of the Jewish mother – the self-sacrificing woman who totally denies her own needs while intrusively involving herself in the lives of her children, meeting their real or unreal needs.

Meanwhile, the Jewish princess, as daughter, is selfish, demanding, and materialistic, and too self-absorbed to be sympathetic to others and to fulfil the needs of her husband. The irony of this juxtaposition is that the princess turns into the Jewish mother as soon as she marries and has children.

This impossibility is similar to another anti-Semitic contradiction – all Jews are capitalists and/or all Jews are communists, either or both are used as needed.

As Jewish women, we must look beyond these stereotype images to strong and positive representations of our diversity. A standard for every Jewish community is the desire to look after each other, as well as to fight for social justice for all societies.

Jewish genetic research

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

One of the areas in which the Internet excels is its ability to allow people with relatively specialized needs to exchange information and even forge virtual communities around the world. One example is the field of Jewish genetic disorders. Despite the fact that most of these disorders are relatively rare, the Internet can help you find information, advice and even empathy from others who are facing similar challenges. Today, genetics and breast cancer research and the ethical and halachic repercussions of genetic testing.

I must emphasize very strongly that although you can find a wealth of information out there, the Internet must not be considered a substitute for trusted medical or rabbinic experts who are familiar with your particular circumstances. Also, pay close attention to the credentials of the authors of anything you read on the Web. Not every one is a reliable or accurate source of information.

Some of the most famous studies about Jews and genetic diseases looked at the occurrence of mutations of breast cancer genes among Ashkenazi women and found higher rates among Jewish women. There are many articles on the Internet about these findings aimed at lay audiences, including the Jewish Communication Network [http://www.jcn18.com/newstand/wahrman/cancer.htm] and USA Today [http://www.usatoday.com/life/health/cancer/breast/lhcbr006.htm].

Scientists are constantly refining their research, and the National Cancer Institute released a report that said although the breast cancer risk is higher among Ashkenazi women, it is lower than was found in previous studies [http://rex.nci.nih.gov/massmedia/pressreleases/jewishgene.html].

If you suspect that you may be a carrier of a genetic disorder, would you get screened? Rita Rubin writes in U.S. News and World Report that despite the fact that two family members were both treated for breast cancer, she has decided not to be tested [http://www.usnews.com/usnews/issue/geneb2.htm]. She feels that even if she tested positive, she wouldn't change her health strategy of regular self-examinations and mammograms.

For the decisions other women have made, take a look at To Know or Not to Know from Ohio State University's Cancer Programs [http://www.osu.edu/units/cancer/wn99frnt/know.htm].

Dr. Mary-Claire King is the researcher who first discovered the existence of the BRCA-1 gene. In a feature article in Newsday on genetics and the breast cancer gene, King emphasized that there are no easy answers to the medical, ethical and legal issues posed by her findings [http://www.newsday.com/features/health/breast/bresmain.htm]. "We're in a purgatorial period now... It's better than hell, but we're not in heaven."

The controversial question of genetic screening and its ethical and halachic implications is dealt with at length in several areas on the Internet. In his essay on Genetic Screening, North Dakota State University student Mike Wetzstein gives an overview of this issue and explains some of Judaism's concerns with genetic screening [http://www.cc.ndsu.nodak.edu/instruct/mcclean/plsc431/students/mike.htm]. "The obligation with regard to procreation is not suspended simply because of the statistical probability that some children of the union may be deformed or abnormal."

Dr. Fred Rosner is a professor of Medicine at Mount Sinai School of Medicine in New York City. In Judaism, Genetic Screening and Genetic Therapy [http://www.ijme.org/Content/Transcripts/Rosner/genetics.htm], he concludes genetic screening and therapy "are permissible in Judaism when used for the treatment, cure, or prevention of disease. Such genetic manipulation is not considered to be a violation of God's natural law but a legitimate implementation of the biblical mandate to heal."

One of the greatest fears about genetic testing is the stigma that could occur if someone is known to be a carrier of a disease. I recommend a fascinating article in the Jewish Homemaker magazine, which looks at a Brooklyn-based organization called Dor Yeshorim [http://ok.org/homemaker/chanukah99/health.html].

Dor Yeshorim tests young men and women before they begin to date. Their results are kept anonymously and are only available to rabbis who compare the charts when couples seriously contemplate marriage. If a couple are both carriers for a certain disorder, they are told their prospective union is "not advisable." No one is told if he or she is a carrier, only that both people must look for another match. The Dor Yeshorim method has apparently gained wide acceptance through Brooklyn's Orthodox community.

Next week, I continue to look at Jewish genetic resources on the Internet and focus on the creative ways people are sharing information and raising awareness.

Rabbi Marmur prepares to say goodbye . . .

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Rabbi Dow Marmur, set to retire at the end of the month, knows he is leaving Holy Blossom Temple in good hands.

"Holy Blossom's great strength lies with its lay leaders. Since I have been with the congregation, there have been no silly shul politics – no underhanded dealings. I was closer to each president at the end of the term, than I was before the term began," says Rabbi Marmur.

As well, Rabbi Marmur is comfortable knowing Rabbi John Moscowitz, assistant rabbi for 13 years, is taking over as senior rabbi. "He is known personally in the congregation [and] that will ensure continuity," Rabbi Mamur said.

Rabbi Marmur was born in Poland in 1935 and spent the war years in the Soviet Union before returning to Poland in 1946. He later emigrated to Sweden, and then attended Leo Baeck College in London, where he graduated as a rabbi in 1962.

He came to Holy Blossom after serving congregations in London for more than 20 years. "It was difficult coming to a different culture and leaving two of our three children, but professionally, it was very exciting. From the outset, I saw that Holy Blossom is a tremendous institution."

Rabbi Dow Marmur

The temple is now a mainstream congregation, he says. "We no longer represent members of one background. We come from all walks of life, and everyone feels at home.

"There is a long history of social involvement. We've become a hands-on congregation, whose members deal with problems as they see them."

The temple has been in the forefront dealing with issues regarding Jews who have or are affected by AIDS, he says, as well as general issues regarding gays and lesbians.

It has also been instrumental in building Plaut Manor, a 97-unit affordable housing unit at Keele Street and Eglinton Avenue W., and it was the first temple to co-sponsor an Out of the Cold program, he says.

"These are only some of the things our volunteers have tried to do in the community. It is part of our understanding of how mitzvot should be performed.

"The division between being involved in Jewish life and being a social activist does not exist any more. We are as much concerned with mitzvot between ourselves and God, as we are with mitzvot between one another. That is part of the widening scope of Jewish life."

In order to attract young families, the temple offers family services, and a new initiative allows members to pay what dues they can in the first year of membership. "This gives them the opportunity to try us out, and there has been a good response. Our task is to do what we can to promote synagogue affiliation.

"Life tends to centre on synagogue affiliation and day school education. To work out at [a health club] is a great thing to do, but it is not rewarding Jewishly," he said.

The synagogue is the obvious grassroots organization for Jews, he says. "It can foster a community that looks across generations.

"Young people cannot be Jewish vicariously. More and more young families want to do things together, and they can do that in synagogue. Merely attending the annual walk-a-thon is not enough."

Rabbi Marmur, author of four books, says he plans to do more writing, and will "continue to react to issues as I see them. I'm also looking forward to seeing the world. In the immediate future, I will be officiating at High Holy Day services in South Africa."

Retirement will definitely be an adjustment, he says, "but one to which I am looking forward, he said. For 38 years, I have been out most evenings."

He and his wife Fredzia, plan on visiting their son and daughter-in-law and their three children in Israel, and their two daughters and one son-in-law in London. "I'm happy to spend more time with my family."

Three Canadian teens to take part in Bronfman Fellowship program

Yakov Frydman-Kohl

TORONTO — Three Canadian teens are among the 26 North American students to take part in this summer's Bronfman Fellowship program, designed to develop future community leaders committed to Jewish unity.

Yakov Frydman-Kohl and Giselle Revah, who are from Toronto and Thornhill respectively, and Catherine Strauss of Ottawa will spend five weeks of intensive study in Israel this summer on the program of the Samuel Bronfman Foundation.

Participants – 13 boys and 13 girls entering Grade 12, who represent a spectrum of Jewish backgrounds from Orthodox to unaffiliated — were chosen from over 300 applicants.

Catherine Strauss

The all-expenses-paid program, which is in its 14th year, includes seminars and dialogue with political and literary figures, representing a broad spectrum of views on political, social and religious issues facing world Jewry.

Giselle Revah

A week of joint programming with their Israeli counterparts will be included.

In explaining the purpose of the fellowships, Edgar Bronfman, chair of the Samuel Bronfman Foundation, said, "... they will discover that there is a common Jewish agenda that transcends the differences among them."

Follow-up programming continues through university.

Greater Toronto Area

. . . as Beth Emeth says hello to Rabbi Morrison

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Rabbi Howard Morrison, a one-time marketing major, changed career direction after realizing as a student at Boston University's School of Management, how fulfilled he felt in summer jobs as a fill-in cantor/Torah reader/spiritual leader.

"I felt very moved and inspired that I was able to grow and help other people grow," he said in a recent interview at Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Synagogue, where he will assume the pulpit Aug. 1.

Rabbi Howard Morrison

A graduate of the Jewish Theological Seminary's Rabbinical School, Rabbi Morrison, 40, was ordained in 1987. Since 1991, he has been the spiritual leader of Long Island's Wantagh Jewish Centre, a traditional Con-servative congregation, like Beth Emeth.

"My bent is traditional Conservative," said Rabbi Morrison, who was raised in a modern Orthodox home in Brookline, Mass.

The great-grandson of an ordained rabbi on his late mother's side, Rabbi Morrison has childhood memories of reading aloud to his paternal grandfather – the shammas of a tiny synagogue in the Bronx – from a large-print Chumash just after he learned to read Hebrew. That grandfather and his wife raised Rabbi Morrison's late father and two uncles as their foster children.

Coincidentally, Rabbi Morrison and Beth Emeth's Cantor Aaron Bensoussan studied at JTS at the same time, and went on to serve nearby congregations in Long Island.

Although he wasn't actively seeking a new position, Rabbi Morrison said he and his wife Joanna are very excited about their upcoming move with their two boys, Elie, 5 and Yonah, 2.

"What impressed me," he said of the 1,500-family Toronto congregation, "is that given its size, it's still a heimish congregation. You feel a sense of intimacy and belonging."

Rabbi Morrison believes a synagogue must "speak to" its members on multiple levels. "I enjoy being given the opportunity to inspire people on religious, spiritual, educational, cultural and social levels," he said.

"I am committed to a type of halachic lifestyle that interacts openly and honestly with the modern world in which we live."

The rabbi probably gets furthest away from his familiar synagogue environment in his duties as a reserve chaplain in the U.S. air force. In the entire United States, he said, there are seven active duty Jewish chaplains in the air force, and six of their reserve duty counterparts.

At his New Jersey base, there are approximately 30 Jewish families. He also serves retired Jewish military families off-base, and equally important, he noted, is his interaction with the non-Jewish community, both as an ambassador of the Jewish faith and as a pastoral counsellor to personnel of all faiths.

"One thing the chaplain provides that no one else does is confidentiality," he said. "We're not in the business of proselytizing."

Rabbi Morrison entered the air force as a rabbinical student in 1984, in part to gain experience interacting with spiritual leaders of different backgrounds and to learn to appreciate their similarities and differences.

Likewise within Judaism, he sees unity within diversity, a value he feels is the strength of the Conservative movement.

Lt. Col. Eddie Goodman of the Jewish War Veterans of Canada addresses recent dinner at Beth Emeth Synagogue. [Adam Segal photo]

Jewish War Veterans remember D-Day

By ADAM SEGAL
CJN Intern

TORONTO — Jewish War Veterans of Canada commemorated the bravery of Canadian Jewish soldiers who fought on the shores of Normandy in World War II, at a recent D-Day dinner.

Held at Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda synagogue, the annual dinner was host to a number of dignitaries including former premier of Ontario Bill Davis, chair of the Police Services Board Norm Gardner, Hugh Segal and guest of honour Lt.-Col. Eddie Goodman.

Goodman, a lawyer, philanthropist and officer of the Order of Canada, served and was wounded on D-Day, June 6, 1944. He remained in the army, reaching the rank of major before returning to Canada in April 1945.

"Jewish veterans must remind the world of the important part Canadian Jews played in the two large struggles of the 20th century," Goodman said, in front of a packed sanctuary.

Almost 17,000 Jewish men and women – 10 percent of Canadian Jews – served in the Canadian army and air force during World War II, and 421 of them lost their lives.

Goodman called on the federal government to use money from the recent surplus to fund the military, which has experienced drastic cuts in recent years.

"There is no institution that draws Canadians together like the military," he said. "Let us maintain our self-respect … and spend decent wages on the army and militia."

An essay recently published in The Canadian Military Journal, suggests cutbacks to training and equipment jeopardized the safety of Canadian pilots involved in the Kosovo air war.

Beth Emeth Rabbi Peretz Weitzman, a holocaust survivor, stressed the need to remember soldiers, whose efforts paved the way for the freedom Canadians enjoy today.

"We will remember those who came and risked their lives for the most precious possession – life," Rabbi Weitzman said

A total of 1.5 million Jews served in the allied armies in World War II. The number of Jewish resistance and partisan fighters is unknown.

Jewish Russian Community Centre reaches out

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The Jewish Russian Community Centre reaches out to thousands of Jews who might otherwise not be connected to the community.

For Purim, the centre offered programs for over 1,500 people, and for Pesach they sponsored seders for over 500 – and that's just this year.

The High Holy Days are expected to serve over 7,000 – even if some have to stand.

Executive director Rabbi Yosef Zaltzman and program director Rabbi Shlomo Vorovitch, aim to offer quality programming for Russian Jews in as many convenient locations as possible, at whatever level of religious knowledge they have achieved, and in whatever language – Hebrew, Russian or English – they are most comfortable.

"The younger people are often losing their Russian, and are happier using English," Rabbi Zaltzman told The CJN.

The Purim celebrations included megillah readings at six locations – the synagogue at 18 Rockford Road; Leah Posluns Theatre, which included a children's concert; Rockford Public School; the JRCC day care; Toronto Jewish Academy Or Menachem, and a seudah at B'nai Torah Congregation.

Rabbi Vorovitch, who became religious through Lubavitch after serving as a Soviet army officer, organized the seders almost single-handedly ("He had at least 12 hands," laughed Rabbi Zaltzman.)

Seders were conducted at six locations so there would not be too many people at any one place, and the venues were close to the areas where Jewish Russians live so they would not have to walk too far.

The location at 3174 Bathurst St. near Lawrence Avenue, was led by young Lubavitchers Menachem Schechter, Zalman Zaltzman and Shmuel Goldberg; at Magen David Synagogue by Rabbi Jeremy Cohen and his wife Sari; Eitz Chaim Patricia campus, by the Vorovitch family; Eitz Chaim Spring Farm campus, by Rabbi Zaltzman and his family; the JRCC synagogue by Uri Kogan; and on Brickstone Circle in Thornhill by Rabbi Levi Jacobson and his family.

"People felt like they were part of our families," said Rabbi Vorovitch.

Seders were conducted mainly in Russian, with varying amounts of Hebrew, or in English. "We wanted to create an atmosphere where people come, and are interested enough to come for a second and third [year]," Rabbi Zaltzman said.

Some people have come often enough (Rabbi Zaltzman has been holding seders since 1981) that they can make their own seders, either with the rabbis or at their own homes, Rabbi Zaltzman said. "Our goal is to put ourselves out of the Pesach business."

They used a Russian/English Haggadah already in print, but want to eventually prepare their own.

The experience was "priceless," said Rabbi Vorovitch. "I began my seder by reminding them that the story of Pesach was the beginning of history. Their being here [at the seder] is a miracle of our time – and sometimes we don't appreciate miracles."

The rabbis said that they do the entire seder, not a truncated version, with communal readings, the children reading the four questions (often led by the rabbis' children) stories, and the thoughts of previous Lubavitcher rebbes. "Our goal is to make a seder that people will enjoy," said Rabbi Vorovitch.

There are two differences from the usual seder, they noted. Lubavitchers no longer "steal" the afikoman, and don't recite the concluding prayer Chasal Seder Pesach.

Next year, the JRCC hopes to expand to even more locations.

Rabbi Vorovitch confessed that the whole process was "exhausting," but "when people come up and say thanks, it's all worthwhile."

For Shavout, they had ice cream parties for children.

Rabbi Zaltzman noted that Toronto Hebrew Academy Or Menachem is moving to its new location on Bathurst St. in Thornhill at the end of this school year.

VISITING THE ART GALERY: Students at Hamilton's Kehila Jewish Community Day School recently took part in interactive workshops with artists at the Hamilton Art Gallery for four consecutive afternoons. Each one of those days started with an art treasure hunt throughout the gallery. The students made masks, musical instruments, box art and collages.

CISEPO program to test Mideast kids for hearing loss

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — From his office in Mount Sinai Hospital in downtown Toronto, Dr. Arnold Noyek can see the future of the Middle East quite clearly.

It involves friendly co-operation, close personal relationships and joint ventures that improve the lot of everyone in the region.

And it involves individuals and non-governmental organizations (NGOs) using "soft power" to give life and substance to words on paper.

Project involves friendly co-operation, joint ventures

For the past several years, Noyek and his colleagues at the Mount Sinai Hospital and the University of Toronto have worked through the Isabel Silverman Canada International Scientific Exchange Program (CISEPO) to forge partnerships among Israelis, Jordanians and Palestinians. CISEPO does so by funding collaborative medical, scientific, educational, training, service and research programs.

The latest CISEPO-financed program that has Noyek excited is one that will screen 12,000 newborn infants in Jordan, Israel and the Palestinian territories for hearing loss. The program will be managed by the Middle East Association for Managing Hearing Loss (MEHA), which consists of senior medical officials from Jordan, Israel and the Palestinian Authority.

The program kicked off on May 16 and involves the combined efforts of almost 75 hospitals and health clinics.

CISEPO will provide MEHA with $150,000 per year for three years as well as transfer $300,000 worth of hearing aids donated by Unitron Industries Limited.

The project should have tremendous impact in Arab communities, Noyek said. On average 10-12 percent of Middle East residents suffer from hearing loss, compared to one in a 1,000 in Canada. In some Arab-Israeli villages, as many as half the population is deaf.

Heredity is the major factor in those disturbing statistics. "Hearing loss is due to inter-familial marriage," he said.

"We are launching the program not only for the benefit of the children, but to build and grow working relationships and promote regional co-operation between health care and scientific professionals," said Noyek, chief of Mount Sinai's otolaryngology department.

"The problem is there's a peace treaty, but not much happening. There needs to be on-the-ground activities. That's what breathes life into the treaties."

By encouraging co-operation between peace party signatories, the "pressures of professional societies opposed to normalization of relations" can be countered, he suggested. "CISEPO brings them together and opens the door under a Canadian umbrella."

Canadian Jewish Congress has endorsed the program.

"We embrace it as an example of what private enterprise can do to make a difference in Middle Eastern politics," said Keith Landy, chair of Congress' Ontario region.

During Congress' recent Peace and Security Mission to Israel, Landy and other Congress officers met Palestinian and Israeli doctors involved in the project as well as Jordanian Crown Prince Firas bin Raad, the patron of MEHA and secretary to King Abdullah for health affairs.

In Canada, Congress has hosted breakfast meetings and other get-togethers for visiting Palestinian and Israeli doctors, Landy said.

New philanthropy trends: meeting the challenge tremendous services to anyone who wants to partner with us and help Jewish community life. We can create shidduchs. It's like one big giant 'shuk' of people who have money and dream of doing good, and people who have dreams of delivering that good."

Philanthropists Charles Bronfman and Michael Steinhardt are perhaps the ultimate example of both.

"Here are two guys who stand up for two of the most important things the federations stand for: central community responsibility and Jewish education," Sokolsky said, admitting that the pair's Birthright initiative, a free 10-day trip to Israel offered to young Jewish adults, has presented "a bit of a challenge" to the federation's system.

"It was a challenge to partner with leading philanthropists in the delivery of services over which, traditionally, federations had a monopoly," he said. Traditionally, Sokolsky noted, federations have offered subsidies based on financial need, whereas Birthright had a different strategy.

Zac Kaye, executive director of Jewish Campus Services of Greater Toronto (JCS), a beneficiary of the federation, found that some of his staff's ongoing work had to be put on the back burner when the organization took on the task of co-ordinating Birthright locally. (The Canada Israel Experience Centre, under the direction of Elizabeth Sokolsky, Ted's wife, is the national co-ordinator.)

"A lot of the on-campus stuff suffered," Kaye recalls. Despite his initial skepticism that a 10-day trip could have a major impact, Kaye is now an enthusiastic proponent of Birthright. "The outcome was much more positive than we would have imagined. Despite the difficulties, it was certainly worth it."

But Kaye is critical of the fact that resources, such as funding to hire more staff for the project, were not made available to JCS, and is negotiating with the federation to address that problem for the coming year.

Birthright founder Steinhardt, who spoke to The CJN while in Toronto for a Hillel conference earlier this year, remains an annual contributor to UJA, although it is "not the focus" of his philanthropy.

Steinhardt's UJA contribution "might be considered a relatively large one," he admitted. He feels UJA provides "necessary services as the heart and soul of any Jewish community, and therefore like any other tax, it's one a good citizen should pay."

But he criticizes the organization for being "so much a consensus organization that it has fallen behind the curve of a rapidly changing Jewish circumstance."

Where the UJA has failed, according to Steinhardt, is "in anticipating the decline in so many aspects of the community that has largely been associated with – ironically – our great Jewish success, the fact that we've been so well accepted."

The percentage of philanthropic dollars "given by Jews to Jewish causes as opposed to secular causes continues to decline," Steinhardt said, referring to American Jewry.

He himself is a major donor to New York's Metropolitan Museum and in the area of wildlife conservation, among others.

In Canada, too, Jewish philanthropists seeking to fund mega-projects are looking outside the Jewish community to universities, art galleries and symphonies, said Sokolsky, who sees the trend as positive. "It's a natural, healthy evolution. It's part of Jewish leadership taking their rightful place within Canadian society."

Among the emerging leaders in Toronto are the Wolfond brothers – Henry, Greg and Chad – who recently provided the lead donation for a new Jewish student centre at the University of Toronto, to be called the Wolfond Centre for Jewish Campus Life, in honour of their parents, Mel and Pedie.

UJA is a tax good citizens should pay: Steinhardt

Chad, the youngest at 36, has a passion for the arts and a sense of commitment to his Jewish heritage. Growing up, his parents instilled in him and his brothers that giving back to the community is important.

A gallery owner, Chad believes the arts are "a fundamental component of life." He has focused his Jewish charitable giving on arts-oriented efforts like Ashkenaz, the Jewish Film Festival and Jewish Book Fair. He is also a supporter of Holocaust Education Week.

"I get involved in Jewish and non-Jewish causes because I think they're important."

Regarding his most recent donation, he hopes to become more involved with JTT. "I feel quite passionate about the ideas of JTT," he said.

Rabbi Baruch Frydman-Kohl of Beth Tzedec Congregation says Jewish law mandates giving tzedakah in a concentric circle, so that one gives to the poor of one's household before the poor of the city, and to the poor of the city before the poor of another community.

"We have to balance local, general needs as well as overseas Jewish needs, so determining what's the concentric circle is not always so clear."Rabbi Frydman-Kohl said. "There is certainly an obligation to care for Jews who are not local, but there is an obligation to care for the general community that is local, including non-Jews."

The rabbi also noted philanthropists often don't consider their own synagogues, an issue that was addressed at last winter's General Assembly of Jewish Federations.

"People are yearning for community," said philanthropist and author Lee Meyerhoff Hendler at the GA. "The most authentic vision of community available to us is synagogues," she said.

Synagogues have traditionally been separate from the federation system, although recently there have been joint federation-synagogue initiatives, such as family education projects.

While concern has been expressed by some that UJA campaigns "may represent a smaller portion of the philanthropic purse," said Sokolsky, "the purse itself is getting much bigger."

Thornhill firm makes Birthright Israel documentary

By SIMONE JOSEPH
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Leonard Pearl, president of a Jewish film documentary company called 12 Tribes Productions Inc., is staring at a tiny video screen in his Thornhill office, watching footage from February's Birthright Israel trip.

Three young Montrealers stand together, tanned and jovial. Their tour bus broke down on the way to a kibbutz in the Golan Heights and they have just finished hiking two miles to their destination. Along the way, they danced the horah on the highway.

Looking into the camera, one of the Montrealers says: "They say God has a reason for everything that happens. I guess our bus broke down for a reason. We saw Israel in a way I guess I never would have seen it."

"When I was there, I thought I would be more connected to my Judaism, my Jewish spirit," says one participant.

"When I got there, the wall didn't sing to me and say, 'You're a Jew and come and celebrate.' I just saw all these different groups of people who didn't seem to give me that unified Jewish spirit that I thought I was going to get...What is it about the Wall that's such a big deal? To me, it wasn't a big deal."

Two friends from Richmond, B.C. are standing on a street in Tel Aviv with their arms around each other.

"I've never experienced Israel like this in my life," says the girl. "I went to the Kotel and Yad Vashem. Being with a group of people around our age and experiencing the educational things we've done [is] the most unreal opportunity."

Pearl first thought of filming the documentary about a year ago when an acquaintance told him about Birthright Israel.

"A spark went off and I said to myself, 'This should be our next project.'"

So Pearl approached Birthright Israel and they agreed to allow him to film the trips.

The documentary, which mainly focuses on the experiences of Canadian participants, is a partnership with Birthright Israel, but not in the financial sense. Birthright Israel will have input into the content of the documentary, Pearl said.

In Israel, Pearl's crew followed participants everywhere.

"We had the camera in our hands from seven in the morning to three in the morning. It was exhausting for us," he says.

They had to lug several pieces of heavy equipment, including cameras, back-up cameras, a microphone, battery cases, lights and tripods.

Of course, there were a few hitches along the way. In the Judean desert, one camera got so hot that it stopped working. After filming a closing concert, the crew almost missed their flight back to Canada.

But Pearl says what was most frustrating about filming the trips was trying to be everywhere at once.

"They [participants] would run up to us and say, 'You missed the best part of the trip — we did this, we did that.'"

Pearl says his consolation came when he viewed the footage and saw the special moments the crew captured.

While most participants and organizers made positive comments about Birthright Israel, Pearl admits he did encounter criticism of the trips while filming the documentary.

In a pre-trip interview, a Birthright Israel organizer in Montreal was skeptical of Birthright and thought participants would merely view the trips as a free ride.

This organizer also questioned the need to fly young Jews all the way to Israel to make them feel Jewish or connected to Israel, rather than developing Jewish programs here in Canada.

Pearl spoke to him again about two weeks ago and said there was a total change in his attitude.

"He thought it was one of the most wonderful experiences for them [participants]," Pearl says.

Pearl also heard an Israeli participant criticize the program. He thought the money would have been better spent invested in Israel or flying Israelis to Canada.

12 Tribes Productions Inc. now has 125 tapes with about 100 hours of footage of interviews with trip funders Charles Bronfman and Michael Steinhardt, as well as with Birthright Israel organizers, volunteers, guest speakers, Israeli educators and participants.

Pearl's staff have to compress the footage into a 45-minute documentary by September. A Canadian station has committed to airing the documentary, Pearl said, but he could not yet say which station would be airing it.

Israeli centre unites Jewish, Arab kids

By MARLANE SMITH
Special to The CJN

VANCOUVER — As Israeli troops and Palestinian police clashed in Ramallah and Nablus, a song for peace – in Hebrew, Arabic and English – echoed half a world away in a Vancouver synagogue.

About 70 people turned out at Temple Sholom recently to learn how the development and growth of the Centre for Jewish-Arab Education is revolutionizing a small portion of the Israeli school system. The multilingual song for peace, led by Myrna Rabinowitz created a peaceful mood in the small audience.

The gathering heard the centre's founders – an Israeli Arab and an American Jew now living in Israel – and an Arab father speak passionately about their project, which brings together Jewish and Arab children in a learning environment. The message was unequivocal: The meeting of Israeli Jews and Arabs must start at an early age if the two cultures are to ever live side-by-side in peace, harmony and mutual understanding.

"The meeting of Jews and Arabs shouldn't start at the university level," said Shafik Masalha, an Israeli Arab psychologist and father of two daughters who attend the Jewish-Arab school.

"By that time it is too late. Ideas and attitudes are already built on attacking the other rather than on an attitude of give and take," he said.

Amin Khalaf, one of the centre's co-founders, admitted he carried about hatred and fear, and had many stereotypes about Israeli Jews before starting his studies at Hebrew University – his first opportunity to attend school with both Arabs and Jews.

According to the other co-founder Lee Gordon, the average Israeli Jew has not had more than a superficial conversation with an Israeli Arab. And most Israeli Arabs have only a shallow knowledge of Jewish life and experience.

Perhaps this is understandable, said Gordon, in a country where there has been only one educational paradigm: separate schools and languages of instruction for Jews and Arabs.

Khalaf and Lee collaborated on their mutual vision of building a new model in the Israeli education system, and in 1998, they opened the centre's first school in Misgav. A second school has since opened in Jerusalem and a third is planned for Jaffa.

"We don't want to bring Arabs out of their communities," Gordon said, "so we're creating schools in cities where both Jews and Arabs live, where they can meet in the middle."

In each classroom, two teachers – one Jewish and one Arab – instruct from a bilingual and bicultural curriculum. While the school is classified as non-religious, teachings include both Jewish and Arab culture and observances.

Khalaf, who is also a parent of a child at the centre, described his hesitation when his young son went to play for the first time at Jewish boy's home.

Questions and doubts preoccupied Khalaf – Would his son understand the Hebrew? How did the Jewish boy's parents feel? He even called his son during the afternoon visit only to hear on the other end, "Everything's fine, Dad. Give me an extra hour."

Khalaf also wondered if Jewish teachings would confuse his son about his own religion. "Not at all," he told the audience. If anything, they've been strengthened, he added. "And now he knows much more than I do about Jewish holidays."

Cemetery vandal sentenced

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — A Winnipeg woman has been sentenced for her role in overturning or uprooting close to 300 headstones at Hebrew Sick Benefit Association Cemetery last August.

Shawna Lehr, 19, was given a nine-month conditional sentence – to be served in the community – and two years of supervised probation by provincial court Associate Judge Bruce Miller, who said he took Lehr's clean record and expressions of remorse into account.

Lehr will be under a curfew for the nine-month period, confined to her home except for work or medical appointments. The judge also ordered her to attend a Holocaust education seminar through the Jewish Federation of Winnipeg and pay $17,600 towards the estimated $100,000 restoration cost of the damaged headstones.

Lehr was one of five young people charged in what police described as a senseless crime of convenience rather than an act of anti-Semitism.

Lehr's co-accused are Chris Diamond, also 19, Russel Martens and Clayton Parker, both 22, and a 16-year-old who cannot be identified because of his age. They were having a party at Lehr's home near the north Winnipeg cemetery. Lehr admitted that she and her friends had been drinking.

Lehr came forward to admit her guilt at the urging of her father. She also apologized for her actions.

Sharon Bronstone, president of the Beth Israel Synagogue which operates the cemetery, isn't buying Lehr's apology.

"They did it just for the thrill," Bronstone said. "That is what she said in court."

Parker, Martens and Diamond originally pleaded not guilty but changed their pleas at their arraignment. The 16-year-old is still insisting on his innocence.

Bronstone said the three have shown no remorse. Their sentences are still pending.

Observations of a lighter kind

Scene in Ottawa

By G.K. SIMCOE

This week, we turn to a couple of items of Jewish interest on a lighter note. Gib Parent, the twice-elected Speaker of the House just returned from an official visit to Israel. Apparently a marvelous time was had by the entire delegation (token members of the other parties joined him on the trip) and the country overwhelmed the Speaker.

It seems that as usual, Canadian and Israeli officials haggled about protocol issues and who should accompany the Speaker on a tour of the Old City. Impatient with both sides, the Speaker was heard to comment, like the prime minister, he wasn't sure where north Jerusalem ended and the south part began, but he did know where to find a cab.

Before the officials could respond, he shepherded the delegation into a taxi, and then armed with a tourist map, led them on his own walking tour of the Old City! Skilled educator that he is, Parent guided the group from sight to sight.

Watching his performance, a first time American visitor to the Old City turned to her husband and nudged him with her elbow. "Ya see," Yossel, she hissed, "I told ya we shoulda hired a guide!" Now, if the Speaker could only navigate through question period as well as he apparently toured the Via Dolorosa!

Closer to home, Jews are accustomed to the usage of Yiddishisms in the vernacular. Lately, one word in particular – kosher – seems to have been cropping up with great frequency; surely a testament to the benefits of Canadian multiculturalism:

- Newly appointed, Nova Scotia Lieutenant Governor, Myra Freeman has declared that her official residence will be equipped with a kosher kitchen;
- Alberta Report ran an article titled, Is It Kosher, which explored whether there is a hidden Jewish conspiracy and tax behind rabbinical certification on food. Former Reform Party insider, now National Post writer, Ezra Levant, claimed it was the article itself that was unkosher and bordered on anti-Semitic. Alberta Report publisher, Link Byfield, was pareve to Levant's offer to write a rebuttal piece and dismissed allegations of anti-Semitism.
- Finally, opposition MP's have been heard to lament in the House Lobby that the government's decision to limit debate on the Clarity bill is "just not kosher". In response, a wizened veteran journalist responded, "why should this bill be any different from the other bills?"

Ambassador and wife going home

During his stay in Canada, Sultan travelled from coast to coast to coast. "I have been to the extreme north, including Iqaluit and Resolute Bay," in addition to visiting all the provinces. "Canada is a very beautiful country," he said.

Certain events of Sultan's tenure in Canada stand out in his mind. "One of the high points was the marking of Israel's 50th anniversary of statehood. The fact that Israel is important for Canada and the fact that this country wanted to mark the anniversary… was one of the highlights," said Sultan. "For me, it demonstrated how close we are, in spite of the geographic distance that separates us."

Because of Canada's interest in the Middle East and its participation in peacekeeping in the region, it is important that the two countries increase and develop a political dialogue, Sultan said. "We established a periodical consultation between the two governments, which is a very useful tool for exchanges of views. We also established dialogues on a number of subjects, including UN international organizations, arms control and various subjects of interest to both countries."

Sultan was instrumental in co-ordinating Prime Minister Jean Chrétien's recent visit to Israel. "I am glad that the first official visit of a Canadian prime minister to Israel took place during my tenure," he said. "We have also helped to organize visits for the Speaker of Parliament, many federal ministers and parliamentarians and senators. In co-operation with the Canadian Jewish Congress, we sent a study mission of 18 presidents of Canadian universities. All that is to strengthen the ties and make the link between our two countries more tangible."

Shortly after Sultan's arrival in Ottawa, the Israel-Canada free trade agreement was discussed on Parliament Hill. Because of that agreement, he said, "in the last three years, the volume of trade between our two countries has increased by 70 percent." There has also been a sizeable increase in high-tech exchanges and investments, in both directions.

"One goal that I am probably leaving to my successor," said Sultan, "is that we are not happy with the way Canada votes in the UN with regard to the Mideast and the Arab/Israeli relations. We are not asking Canada to support Israeli positions, but only to be neutral. I think friendly countries should leave substantive issues to the parties involved and adopt a neutral position."

Sultan has been impressed by the mark the Jewish community has made on the wider Canadian community.

"Wherever I went, I heard from premiers, politicians and mayors about the valuable contribution of the Jewish community and it was a source of pride to hear that. I personally enjoyed the support and encouragement of the Jewish community; no doubt, it makes the task much easier."

The Sultans leave Canada in early July. They have been warmly received and made many friends but are anxious to see their two daughters and one-year-old granddaughter in Israel. Sultan will return to his position of deputy director general in the Foreign Ministry and await his next posting.

Volunteer medical help sought airfare, medical insurance, food and accommodations.

"We call on medical personnel in the world Jewish community to join us in this humanitarian effort based on our common value of tikkun olam," said Meir Nitzan, director general of JAFI's Israel department, who is directing the mission.

The goal of the missions, known as Operation Abie – for the late Abie Nathan, the Israeli pioneer of humanitarian aid to needy populations worldwide – is to improve the health situation of Ethiopians living in the Welo province, situated in the north-east part of the country, said Nitzan.

"This is a disaster that will not end in three weeks," said Offer Isseroff, director of the Jewish Agency office in Toronto. "We want to create a pool of doctors and nurses who will try to change the destiny of those Ethiopians at risk.This is our opportunity to show that not only do we care, but that we are willing to sacrifice and make a real contribution."

Volunteers will be selected for the program based on their professional skills and experience. They will be briefed on the health situation and harsh living conditions in the region, and will be immunized against infectious diseases, he said.

"It is something very special for volunteers to take part in this mission. We are showing the world that Jews, who are always known to help people in distress, can come together and help in times of need," said Isseroff.

Barak reassures Bashar on peace

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Prime Minister Ehud Barak sent a message of reassurance to Syria on Sunday that Israel has no intention of using the transition period in Damascus to stir up trouble in Lebanon.

The message was sent through Washington, Amman, and Cairo in telephone conversations Barak held with the heads of state in all three capitals.

Barak asked President Bill Clinton, King Abdullah II, and President Hosni Mubarak to pass on the message to Bashar Assad – and to seek reassurances from Syria that it too would not use the period between Hafez Assad's death and the consolidation of power by his son Bashar, as the new president in Syria, to raise regional tension.

Barak asked ministers to refrain from commenting publicly on the transition of power, lest their comments have a disruptive influence on Damascus. Barak said that he and Clinton agreed that it is unlikely that there will be a quick resumption of the Israeli-Syrian peace negotiations, at least until Bashar Assad is well-ensconced in the presidency.

IDF Chief of Staff Shaul Mofaz noted that so far the transition of power, which Sunday saw the 34-year-old Bashar Assad promoted from lieutenant-colonel to commander-in-chief of the Syrian army, is proceeding smoothly.

Israel has not taken any military steps in the wake of Hafez Assad's death, but top IDF officers say that they have stepped up intelligence observation of Syria and Lebanon in case of any untoward activity. Northern Front Cmdr. Gabi Ashkenazi said that there were no signs of any unusual military activities in Syria.

Barak told the Cabinet that Assad's death created "a new Middle East that we will have to study." He said that while changes were expected in a number of areas, he expected continued stability and quiet in Lebanon in the immediate future.

Israel's pullout from Lebanon came at a particularly good time, Barak said, because "if it had been delayed, it might have been more difficult to reach stability in south Lebanon after the withdrawal."

Syria's grief inaugurates new era

By DANNY RUBINSTEIN
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

Palestinian Authority leaders estimate that the death of Hafez al-Assad will help them move forward on the political track in talks with Israel. The peace process between Israel and Syria will be held in abeyance for some time, and the Palestinians will spurt ahead in the race.

Palestinian spokesmen expressed hope that the hostility that has strained relations over the past 35 years between the late president's Ba'ath regime and the Arafat-led Palestine Liberation Organization will now cease, or at least be eased. This acrimony stems partly from personal factors which date from the mid 1960s – or, more precisely, from May 1966, when it became clear to Assad (who was Syria's defence minister at the time) that Arafat was misleading him.

Before this point, an alliance had been forged between the then recently formed Fatah organization and Syria's Ba'ath regime. At the time, Arafat and his comrades went so far as to refer to Syria as a second homeland. The alliance ruptured when Assad discerned that Arafat was using Syria as a base for actions carried out against Israel without obtaining prior consent from Syria, and without co-ordinating his strikes with the Syrian army.

The Syrians planted an army officer who had Palestinian ancestry, Yusef Urabi, in Fatah, to serve as a spy and monitor Arafat and his colleagues' actions from within, and also perhaps try to take control of the organization. Arafat and his comrades, however, identified the spy, and Urabi was murdered.

As far as the Syrians were concerned, this murder represented insufferable treachery. Arafat and other Fatah operatives served time in Syrian prison cells.

Since their release, up to the present day, Syrian-PLO relations have been an endless series of political clashes, unpleasant incidents, hostile actions and even wars. The peak was reached during the war with Lebanon, when Syria stood on the sidelines as the IDF pounded the Palestinians. Syria subsequently initiated a rebellion in the Fatah ranks against Arafat and sent an army to fight against the Palestinian leader in Tripoli.

In recent years, Assad adamantly refused to meet Arafat or to proffer assistance to him on any matter. This refusal, however, was not rooted entirely in personal animosity. The Syrians, who view themselves as representing the fulcrum of what Arab tradition calls Greater Syria, demand that they play a role as partners in the resolution of the Palestinian problem. They might not seek to rule directly in Palestine in a manner reminiscent of the hegemony they exercise in Lebanon; yet, at a minimum, they seek a role akin to the one that Egypt has been playing, counselling and directing Arafat.

These Syrian ambitions are the reason why Assad insisted until recently that in his view, the question of Jerusalem (and Palestine generally) should precede discussions about the Golan Heights. But as the PLO gained strength and the peace process picked up steam, Assad relinquished ambitions concerning Palestine.

Reflecting on the Syrian ruler's death, Palestinian spokesmen say that Assad had two weapons in his struggle against Israel. The first was the Palestinian problem; and in this respect, Assad lost his leverage in 1993, when Yitzhak Rabin and Yasser Arafat signed the Oslo agreement.

The second weapon in his arsenal was Lebanon; and Assad's ability to use Lebanon as leverage against Israel vanished in recent days, when the IDF pulled out of the country, at a time when the ailing Syrian ruler may not have been able physically to respond to events.

For the Palestinians, and almost certainly not only for them, a new era has begun.

In breaking the news to the Syrian public, an announcer on Syria's state-run television station announced, "Death has taken away from Syria a leader." The announcer's voice choked as he began to cry.

"This is a day of sadness and sorrow in every home, school, university, farm, factory and quarry," the announcer continued. "Sadness is in the heart of every man, woman and child ... The legacy of his accomplishments and ideas is a planet that will shine not just on this generation, but also on coming generations."

"This is a very difficult catastrophe," said taxi driver Mohammed Kurdi. "I never thought I would see another leader. I thought he was immortal. His passing spells major political changes in the region."

Prime Minister Ehud Barak received IDF intelligence reports Saturday morning of unusual events in Damascus. A few hours later, well before the official announcement, the prime minister learned from intelligence agents that President Assad had died.

Barak, who also serves as defence minister, instructed the IDF to take necessary followup measures and to be on increased alert "as is necessitated by such a situation." He then wrote Israel's official reaction to the death, released by Jerusalem just a short time after Syria officially announced its president's passing, making Israel the first country to respond to Assad's death.

"The Israeli government understands the sorrow of the Syrian people over the passing of President Hafez Assad," said the statement. "Israel worked in the past to achieve peace and will continue to do so in the future," it continued. "Israel views with importance quiet along the border, and it hopes Syria will also act accordingly."

A political source in Jerusalem added, "As far as we know, Bashar Assad is a serious man, talented, educated, modern and open to the wide world ... It may be that what we could not achieve with Assad senior, we will achieve with the son."

Security sources said Saturday that it is too soon to estimate the event's impact on a renewal of talks and the situation in Lebanon. Intelligence sources say that Assad died of natural causes, according to information they received. They believe that Bashar Assad is in control of the situation; so far, there have been no reports of any extreme measures taken in the wake of Assad's death.

The IDF believes that Bashar Assad's first concern will be to ensure as smooth a transfer of power as possible. Thus, at least initially, there will be no attempts to pressure Israel in any way. It is also possible that Syria will scale down its pressure on Lebanon to take a firm position against Israel and the UN on the issue of the international border. In contrast, however, it is not clear how much attention Syria will give to Hezbollah's activities against Israel.

On hearing the news of the Syrian president's death, Prime Minister Jean Chrétien characterized Assad as "the architect of modern Syria," who had played "a key role in the Middle East."

Canada was to be represented at Assad's funeral in Damascus Tuesday by Minister of Foreign Affairs Lloyd Axworthy.

U.S. Secretary of State Madeleine Albright was scheduled to represent the United States at the funeral. President Bill Clinton decided not to attend the funeral in light of Assad's past, his repeated refusal to reach an agreement with Barak and the fact that Syria is included on the U.S. government's list of countries that support terrorism. There is also the fear that the political-military situation in Syria does not allow a visit by the U.S. president.

Clinton himself expressed sorrow at Assad's passing and announced that he expects to continue to work with Syria to reach a broad peace agreement in the Middle East.

"Over the past seven years," the president continued, "I had met him many times and got to know him very well. We had our differences, but I always respected him."

The U.S. government stressed yesterday that Assad's death and the change in leadership will not interrupt, and may perhaps even assist, a Camp David-type peace summit between Clinton, Barak and Palestinian Authority Chairman Yasser Arafat next month in Washington.

Assad's son clears hurdle to leadership

Ha'aretz Daily News Ltd.

BEIRUT — Within hours of President Hafez Assad's death Saturday, the Syrian parliament voted to clear the way for the ascension of the 34-year-old son he has been grooming for power.

Bashar Assad has held no political office, no senior party post and no significant military position – the usual requirements for leadership in authoritarian Syria. But the late president had given Bashar several tasks, both at home and in neighbouring Lebanon, to thrust him into public roles and recognition.

The president died exactly one week before a Ba'ath Party congress that was expected to give Bashar a senior party position and set him on the path to higher office. Instead, less than two hours after the public announcement of the president's death, parliament amended the constitution to lower the age limit for the presidency from 40 to 34.

Technically, the Syrian constitution provides for a vice-president to take over if the presidency falls vacant. But there was little doubt Saturday that the late president's wish was being honoured and that Bashar Assad, a British-educated ophthalmologist, was headed for the presidency.

Upon hearing of Assad's death, a few hundred people gathered in the streets near the presidential palace, chanting "With our souls, with our blood, we will protect you, O Bashar."

In neighbouring Lebanon, where Syria wields enormous influence, some leaders were already referring to Bashar yesterday night as "the next president" of Syria and "the bearer of his father's message."

The late president started preparing Bashar for leadership after the death of his eldest son, Bassil, in a traffic accident in 1994.

Assad had sent Bashar abroad on official visits, giving him a forum for Arab and international exposure. At home, Bashar was proclaimed the leader of a campaign to fight corruption in the government – which also eliminated potential rivals in the older generations of military and civilian officials.

Bashar was promoted to the rank of commander-in-chief of the Syrian army on Sunday. Syria's armed forces and intelligence branches are at the heart of control in this nation of 15 million people.

In recent months, several senior army officers have been retired and powerful intelligence chiefs were sent packing.

June 5

• UN officials finished defining the border between Israel and Lebanon, according to UN envoy Terje Roed Larsen. This paves the way for sending peacekeepers into the area. (Subsequently, UN officials told Israel that the border must be adjusted near kibbutz Misgav Am.)

June 6

• Prime Minister Ehud Barak accused Syria of planning to use south Lebanon as a launching pad for attacks on Israel. "There is a Syrian attempt to recruit Palestinian activists to send them to act against Israel. If it happens, we'll know what to do," Barak said.

June 7

• The Knesset gave preliminary approval to a bill to hold early elections. Three parties from the coalition – The NRP, Shas, and Yisrael b'Aliyah – supported the opposition bill. The bill must pass three more votes to become law.

June 8

• Hundreds of people opposed to further IDF withdrawal from the territories protested outside the prime minister's official residence in Jerusalem and in a neighbourhood of Abu Dis.

• Tourism in northern Israel appeared to have rebounded for the Shavuot holiday. Northern guest houses reported full capacity.

• Russia, France, Israel and Germany are the four main contenders for a bid to modernize Ukraine's Soviet-produced MIG-29 and SU-25 aircraft, according to Ukraine's minister of defence, Alexander Kuzmuk.

June 9

• Shavuot .

Israel & the Jewish World

Ottawa civil servant gives and gets help in Israel

By VIVA PRESS
CJN Israel Bureau

JERUSALEM — Karen Ginsberg, director-general of the Citizens' Participation and Multiculturalism program at Canadian Heritage, was recently in Israel to participate in a conference on multiculturalism.

The conference, organized by the Friedrich Ebert Foundation, brought together heritage ministers and politicians from around the world.

Although it may seem odd that Canada would attend a conference on multiculturalism in Israel and not the other way around, Ginsberg said "there is an enormous amount of activity on co-existence [in Israel]."

The Friedrich Ebert Foundation, she noted, works towards democratic policies and gaining equal rights for women and minorities.

Ginsberg, 52, said that when she first entered politics, she was in the minority for two reasons: one, she is a woman, and two, she is Jewish.

Karen Ginsberg

Born in Winnipeg's North End, Ginsberg's entry into politics was neither encouraged, nor discouraged.

Her father was a travelling salesman, her mother a homemaker. Her grandparents owned a small store.

The aspiration of everyone there, she said, was "the kids will do better. They'll embrace their Jewish values in the New World."

She moved to Toronto, where she obtained a bachelor of arts (honours) in English literature and political science from the University of Toronto.

In 1971, the New Democratic Party (NDP) was being formed and she was offered a job in one of their affirmative action programs.

From 1974 to '76, she worked as an administrator for the community college system in her hometown province, Manitoba.

She pointed to her days with B'nai Brith as her inspiration to enter politics.

"I was a major macher," she said. "It taught [me] about citizenship, leadership and responsibility."

In her years in public service, she said she has yet to come across anti-Semitism.

"There's a very high degree of respect" in the work environment.

Ginsberg began working with the federal government in 1976 in the Department of Regional Economics. At the same time, she studied for a master's degree in political science at the University of Manitoba.

She has now been working for the heritage department for 16 months where she manages a broad range of national policies relating to Canadian identity, Canadian studies, youth participation and urban aboriginal peoples.

Before joining the heritage department, Ginsberg was with the Public Service Commission.

During her years in public service she also worked on aboriginal issues as a project director on the Royal Commission on Aboriginal Peoples and with the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development as director of program planning and review.

Canada's multiculturalism program is very important to its citizens, said Ginsberg in an interview at Jerusalem's Dan Panorama hotel. Their goals include social justice and civic participation.

"We want to reach out to every Canadian," she said, referring to the government's aims to ensure that Canada's diversity is an element of national pride for everyone and that equality for all Canadians is a reality.

"To build policies that are felt to be inclusive, one must think about multiculturalism," she said.

Canada, she added, is more than pleased to help Israel in forming such policies.

In fact, a few months ago, Israel sent two people to Canada from Rabbi Michael Melchior's Ministry of Israeli Society and World Jewish Communities to meet with its heritage department officials and learn about their legal and policy framework.

"They came away with the notion that Canada had things to offer," she said.

And while she was here to help, Ginsberg also came to Israel to get help. She came to search for lost family members. Her maternal grandmother was one of 12 children.

"I know there's a large family here," said Ginsberg, who is one of four children and has four children of her own. "I don't expect to find anyone."

Ginsberg said her desire to find these lost relatives is a gift for her mother, who is 80.

Whether or not she finds any relatives, Ginsberg said she loved being "back" in Israel – she was a volunteer on a kibbutz in the North 30 years ago. And she said she is "expecting to come back" again, "and it won't take [another] 30 years."

Controversial Passion Play tries to reform itself

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

OBERAMMERGAU — Can a world famous passion play stigmatized by the mark of anti-Semitism reform itself?

That was the burning question as this year's play – a stirring pageant that attracts 500,000 visitors from around the globe in its 4½-month run – got under way in this picturesque Bavarian village of 5,000 inhabitants nestled near the foothills of Germany's Alps.

Performed once almost every decade since 1634 as an offering to God for having spared the villagers from a deadly plague, the six-hour play, based on the four Gospels in the Christian Bible, portrays Jesus' entry into Jerusalem and the events leading up to his crucifixion and resurrection.

In addition, the play presents stylistic tableaux from the Jewish Bible, including the stories of Abraham and Isaac and of Moses leading the Israelites to the Promised Land.

The text of A Play of Death and Life, its official title, has gone through 10 scripts since the 17th century, all of which have been problematic from a Jewish point of view.

Traditionally riddled with anti-Jewish references and stereotypes depicting Jews as the amoral enemies of Jesus, it was effusively praised by Adolf Hitler in 1934 as a "precious tool" in Nazi Germany's concerted campaign against Jews.

Cancelled in 1944, the play roared back to life in 1950 with the permission of the Allied powers occupying western Germany.

Under international pressure, the residents of Oberammergau, south of Munich, gradually began to delete the anti-Semitic content. This year's version has been completely revamped, claimed its co-director, Otto Huber, in an interview about a week after its official opening.

Working in co-operation with the B'nai Brith Anti-Defamation League and Temple University, Huber and his colleague, Christian Stuckl, have made wholesale changes in an effort to root out offensive passages.

"I understand we have to be careful in presenting a passion play," said Huber, a personable, shaggy-haired, 53-year-old intellectual who has been associated with the play since 1986. "I am completely aware of this problem."

Rabbi Leon Klenicki, the Anti-Defamation League's director of interfaith affairs, acknowledges changes in dialogue and staging. But in a recent report, he wrote that the latest script is bedevilled by "serious problems."

It suggests that Jews are collectively guilty for Jesus' death and minimizes the Romans' responsibility for it, he said.

In another report, Rabbi James Rudin of the American Jewish Committee gave the play a mixed review.

While taking note of the rewrite, he concluded that it is still "a troubled text."

Two of his colleagues, Sister Mary Boys of the Union Theological Seminary in New York City and Rev. John Pawlikowski of the Catholic Theological Union in Chicago, observed that the text remains deeply flawed in terms of its depiction of Judaism.

Huber, a devout Catholic whose grandfather played the role of the Jewish high priest Caiphas in past productions, is hurt by the accusations.

"The play is not anti-Semitic. I can say this 100 percent. It does not inspire ideas of hatred against Jews, really not."

But in a caveat, Huber added, "Maybe it will inspire hatred of historical Jews."

Is the play anti-Judaic? "I would say no, but there are parts in the second half which are not clear, and this is a problem."

Can the current text be adjusted? "It would be quite difficult to make more changes now."

Dismissing the critics as arrogant, Huber appears convinced that "normal" playgoers will not leave the theatre with feelings of hostility toward Jews and Judaism.

"The play reinforces the Jewishness of Jesus, and for Christians, this is a new experience."

Jews are not seen as "God-killers," nor, en masse, as "the bad guys." As he put it: "We make it clear that the Romans crucified Jesus."

Huber, in the off-season a high school teacher in the nearby town of Murnau, ticked off other salient changes in the play.

- Jesus, shown as a rabbi, blesses the wine in Hebrew. And when he prays, he covers his head.
- The Last Supper, with a menorah on the table, is clearly portrayed as a Passover seder.
- Judaism is cast positively in the tableaux.
- A likeable new Jewish character, Gamliel, appears.
- An anti-Jewish phrase from Matthew 27:25, "the blood be upon us," has been excised.
- Judas Iscariot, formerly characterized as a money-grubber, comes across as a kinder, gentler, more complex soul. And no longer does he wear a demeaning yellow costume.
- The word "goy" has been replaced by "Roman" to underline the point that Israel was occupied by the Romans.

Huber, whose late father was a card-carrying member of the Nazi party, argued that theatre can never be crystal clear in terms of the images it conveys. "There is always ambivalence. We can't control the anti-Judaic shit in a spectator's mind."

In his quest to gain Jewish support for the passion play, Huber travelled to the United States and Israel. He met with rabbis, scholars and community leaders and visited synagogues.

The trips, he explained, gave him a much better understanding of Judaism.

Referring to his father, Huber disclosed that he had had "enormous struggles" with him about the Nazi era. "I reproached him, and I suffered in my life because I am the son of a nation of killers. I have experienced this question of the guilt of the fathers."

According to Huber, 56 percent of the residents of Oberammergau – a renowned centre of wood carving that was a hotbed of National Socialism – voted in a 1997 referendum to revamp the play. They also agreed that non-Christian performers and unmarried women could be used. In a cast of 2,000 actors and extras, the play employs eight Muslims, though no Jews.

It is expected to turn a handsome profit.

Sentences handed down in Maccabiah disaster

By NAOMI SEGAL
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — A Tel Aviv court sentenced four of five defendants to spend up to 21 months in jail for their role in a bridge collapse at the 1997 Maccabiah Games.

A fifth Israeli was given a sentence of community service.

The defendants had already been found guilty of negligence in connection with the collapse, which left four Australian athletes dead and scores of others injured.

"There has never been a case of such negligence at a mass public event, and the punishment must be a deterrent," Tel Aviv Magistrates Court Judge Edna Beckenstein said when handing down the sentences.

But the father of one of the Australian athletes seriously injured in the collapse called the sentences a "disgrace."

Colin Elterman, whose 18-year-old daughter, Sasha, has undergone more than 30 operations since the accident, called on Israelis to boycott the next Maccabiah Games to protest the sentences.

In the summer of 1997, a temporary footbridge over the Yarkon River collapsed during the opening ceremonies of the Maccabiah Games, sending the delegates tumbling into the river's polluted waters.

In its verdict, the three-judge panel found the bridge was built haphazardly, with no proper plan, foundation and supervision.

The greatest responsibility for the disaster was placed on Micha Bar-Ilan, the engineer who designed the bridge. The court sentenced him to 21 months in jail.

Baruch Karagula and Yehoshua Ben-Ezra, the subcontractors who built the bridge, were each sentenced to 15 months in prison.

Adam Mishori, of the Irgunit company, which was responsible for the bridge's construction, was sentenced to nine months in jail.

Yoram Eyal, the head of the organizing committee for the international games, was sentenced to six months of community service.

Frank Stein, the director of the Zionist Federation of Australia in Israel, said the deep pain and anger felt by the families of the bridge collapse victims is understandable, but added that the majority of the Jewish community in Australia believes the trial was fair.

"There is a great deal of faith and belief in the Israeli justice system and the fact that four of the five will be sitting in jail" could "bring to a close another chapter of this tragic story of the Maccabiah," he said.

Despite the sentence, the legal portion of the tragedy has not been closed.

Support group aids parents of disabled children

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Tehila Bak, president of Ahada, an Israeli support network for parents of children with disabilities in kibbutzim and moshavim, knows firsthand what it's like to have nowhere to turn in a crisis.

"My daughter, who died in 1995, was schizophrenic, and I was desperate because no one seemed to know how to help me. I finally met a woman who put me in touch with Ahada, and its members saw me all the way through her illness," she said on a recent visit to Toronto.

The goal of the grassroots, volunteer-run organization, she said, is to support parents in the day-to-day problems of bringing up a disabled child, and to offer children the possibility of a secure future.

With over 600 parent members across the country, the Ahada network encompasses the needs of children with a range of disabilities, and offers advice on a variety of related subjects. "We are the only organization in the country that absorbs parents of children with both physical and mental disabilities.

"Over 90 percent of our members live on kibbutzim, moshavim or small communities, from Eilat to Metulla. They live in the periphery where there is little services and support," Bak said.

Ahada provides parents of children with similar disabilities with each other's phone numbers, so that they can speak during a crisis. "These are people who are willing to have their phone ring at any hour. Having someone to talk to is more important than anything else," Bak said.

The organization also runs seminars, conventions and lecture groups for parents. "We try to find subjects that suit every parent. They can attend these lectures and exchange ideas with other parents. It is a very strong support network," Bak said.

Bak estimates there may be another 600 families who do not know about the organization's existence. "We have to publicize ourselves. We lecture to social workers, doctors and nurses in hospitals and other institutions so they can inform parents about the organization."

Ahada is represented on the law and rights committee in the Knesset, she said, and its members are kept up to date on legal issues affecting disabled people.

"Ahada is a strong advocate of the handicapped in Israel, and keeps in contact with all relevant organizations in Israel and overseas.

"Israel has many social service benefits which they do not publicize. Without this information, many parents do not know what they are entitled to receive. Benefits do not come automatically; parents need to be aware what is out there."

On her recent tour to Washington, Newark, Toronto and Ottawa, Bak met with representatives of organizations such as Reena, Jewish Family & Child Service, UJA FEDERATION and several self-help organizations.

"I would like to see an exchange program between disabled youth here and in Israel. North American youth could come and stay on a kibbutz with a family familiar with their disability."

While here, Bak visited group homes in order to "take some ideas back to Israel. A general trend is to close down institutions, and we would like to be able to move some residents into group homes. For now, however, that is a dream."

For information on Ahada, e-mail Bak at ahada@amiad.org.il, or write Ahada, c/o Tehila Bak, Kibbutz Amiad, P.M. Galil, Elyon l 12335.

Jewish single moms get help in Vancouver

By MARLANE SMITH
Special to The CJN

VANCOUVER — When Azima Buell left her husband in the mid-1980s, she questioned how the decision would impact upon her young daughter.

"I wondered if I had completely destroyed her life," she says.

Recently, from her Vancouver office inside the Jewish Community Centre, Buell, a family therapist, talked about the importance of support groups.

Soon after her marriage broke up, Buell joined a single mother's group after a friend urged her to become a member.

"It was tremendously helpful, but it lacked something," she says.

Buell, along with others at Vancouver's Jewish Family Services Agency, now facilitates a support group for single Jewish mothers. It fills the void she felt years ago in her own single mother's network, she says.

The group of about six to eight women meets for two hours each Tuesday evening at the JCC. "We discuss anything the women want to talk about. Sometimes it's what they want to vent about."

They often don't even cover Jewish topics, she says, but by having this connection, the group has really bonded.

The group's mandate is to provide a support network for single mothers, and give them an opportunity to learn about available resources.

"They talk about anything, from how difficult preparing for Shabbat or Pesach can be, to what's happening in their kid's lives. Some of the women want to talk about their ex-partners.

"It's quite a support network for single Jewish moms," Buell said.

Some Jewish women are reluctant to join a group such as this because they don't want to be seen as needy, she says. "Some people believe there is a stigma attached to a person who admits they need some help or support.

"It's not about coming to the group because you're messed up. The women appreciate the extra support. It's quite heartwarming because we have women from different streams of Judaism coming together and discussing the same issues."

The weekly meetings, sponsored by the Counselling Foundation of Canada and the YWCA, are free. Childcare is also available at no cost.

Film explores changing nature of Israeli society

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

One millions Russians have arrived in Israel in the past 30 years, the vast majority since the precipitous breakup of the Soviet Union in 1991.

As expected, these newcomers have had an enormous impact on Israel in cultural and political terms.

The Russians have influenced the outcome of several national elections, and from a cinematic point of view, their presence is already being widely felt.

Arik Kaplun, one of these Russian immigrants, is the director of Yana's Friends, a 90-minute feature, in Hebrew with English subtitles, set during the 1991 Gulf War.

Scheduled to open at Canada Square and Bayview Village on June 23, it dominated the 1999 Israeli academy awards and was seen at more than 30 international film festivals, including Toronto's.

Yana's Friends, which can best be described as a romantic comedy, revolves around the trials and tribulations of newly arrived Russian immigrants in their adopted land.

The focus, however, is on a young childless couple, Yana (Evelyne Kaplun, the director's wife, I assume) and Fima (Israel Demidov), who cannot quite make ends meet.

Nir Levi as Eli and Evlyn Kaplun as Yana in Yana's Friends.

Determined to improve his lot in life, Fima returns to Moscow, promising to come back rich. He leaves Yana pregnant and in something of an emotional and financial lurch.

After his departure, Yana meets her neighbour Eli (Nir Levi), an easy-going photographer and voyeur with a casual approach to sex.

As their romance blooms, Kaplun weaves two subplots into the story. The first is about a sleazy Russian who tries to exploit an unfortunate family situation. The second turns on Rosa, Yana's landlady, and an affair she once had with a Russian man.

These diversionary tales are somewhat diverting, but not nearly as interesting as Yana's budding relationship with Eli.

Indeed, one of the most original scenes in this appealing movie unfolds against the backdrop of an Iraqi Scud attack on Tel Aviv.

As the explosion of a falling missile sounds, Eli and Yana make love with their gas masks on. Now that's unusual!

Yana's Friends, though far from being exceptional, is open and unaffected, with competent performances from the lead actors.

It's a film that not only explores personal relations, but the changing nature of Israeli society.

Veteran actor has a double role in new musical

By KATHRYN KATES
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Veteran actor, singer and dancer Gerry Salsberg, 51, is lending his talents to Toronto's newest musical, Romancin' The One I Love.

Inspired by Shakespeare's The Taming of the Shrew, this 1930s big band musical is set in Miami and Manhattan and opens at the Winter Garden Theatre Centre on June 21.

Co-starring with Camilla Scott and Brad Aspel, Salsberg plays two roles in this production – Gremio, the wacky widower mayor of Miami in pursuit of Bianca, and Vencentio, a wealthy businessman from Boston with important political ties, reminiscent of Joe Kennedy.

"Romancin' The One I Love is a screwball comedy played for the energy of that time… with a nice kind of swing to it," says Salsberg, who will be making his third appearance at the Elgin/Winter Garden Theatre.

Thanks to his father Sam, Salsberg was exposed to the arts at a very young age. "My dad owned Salsberg's Cigar Store & Ticket Agency. It was the hub of the Jewish Community. People who wanted to get tickets to the Royal Alex or O'Keefe would get them at Salsberg's," he says.

"My dad used to send me to the theatre by myself when I was a little kid, just to get rid of me for the day. The first musical I saw was West Side Story – I was smitten by musical theatre from that moment on."

Salsberg learned his craft by acting in school productions at Forest Hill Collegiate and at Ryerson Polytechnic University. While in a show called Riot at Ryerson, Salsberg heard about a general call for non-professional performers for Royal Alexandra's production of Godspell.

For the audition, he sang What's it All About Alfie. To this day, Salsberg can't believe singing that song landed him his first professional role as Judas.

"Opening night in Godspell was a moment of feeling an incredible sense of accomplishment," Salsberg says.

"I was an usher at the Royal Alex when I was a teenager in the mid '60s and here I was standing on stage in one of the most beautiful theatres in North America, in one of the most prestigious shows. Ninety percent of the cast, including Gilda Radner, Martin Short, Eugene Levy and Andrea Martin, went on to stardom."

At that time, on a dare from Martin Short, Salsberg auditioned for the first Toronto production of Second City. His initial audition didn't go as smoothly as he wanted, but luckily the show's Chicago- based producers, Bernie Salins and Joyce Sloan, caught his portrayal of Judas in Godspell. He was hired over Eugene Levy, who joined the cast later in the run.

While many of his contemporaries left Canada to work south of the border, Salsberg has enjoyed steady employment in this country. He has appeared in a number of films and television roles, including PSI Factor, Cagney and Lacey, The Anne Jillian Story and La Femme Nikita.

But theatre continues to be his first love. "I've always had a preference for the stage because of the high you get performing for people and the feedback you get from the audience when they are enjoying it," he says.

"Theatre is so spontaneous and that is something you don't experience when you do television or film."

Salsberg has appeared in many theatrical productions, including Fiddler On The Roof in Edmonton and Winnipeg, and at Toronto's Leah Posluns Theatre in 1984. He dedicated his performance to his children, Zachary, now 18, and Dania, now 16.

"It's a great part that is very close to my heart. Tevye's kids leave him to do their thing, but he still has deep love for his children. His love can't be destroyed, it is just there. That's what I feel about my kids," he explains.

For tickets to Romancin' The One I Love at the Elgin and Winter Garden Theatre Centre, call 416-872-5555. All preview seats cost $35 from June 9 to 20. From June 21, tickets are $25 to $65.

TORONTO FILMMAKER SETS CAMERA SIGHTS ON BLACK SEA EXPEDITION

Nearly 800 Romanian and Russian Jewish refugees attempting to reach Palestine died when their ship, the Struma, was torpedoed by a Russian submarine in the Black Sea in 1942.

Greg Buxton, a British computer systems designer whose paternal grandparents were lost in the tragedy, has arranged a 12-person diving expedition in August in search of the vessel, the London-based Jewish Chronicle reports.

The Chronicle also reports that Emmy-award-winning filmmaker Simcha Jacobovici, the son of a Holocaust survivor, intends to shoot a documentary on the expedition. Jacobovici, a Toronto resident, made Quest For The Lost Tribes, an hour-long documentary that aired recently on the A&E and CBC television networks.

The Struma sat in a harbour in Istanbul for 70 days because neither the Turks nor the British authorities in Palestine would allow its passengers to land. After the Turks towed the ship back out to sea, it was struck by the Russian torpedo.

The death toll was 406 men, 269 women, and 103 children. There was only one survivor, David Stoliar, who was eventually permitted to settle in Palestine.

"It is part of my family story," said Buxton, in explaining why he wants to salvage artifacts from the wreck and exhibit them in museums in Turkey, Israel and the United States. "My grandparents had bought a plot of land in Palestine before settling. But they didn't get very far."

One-third of the cost of the salvage expedition is being borne by the Holocaust Museum in Washington, DC. Buxton says he is also working closely with Yad Vashem and the Turkish and Romanian Jewish communities.

On a recent trip to Israel, Buxton met the rabbi of Tel Aviv's Romanian synagogue, which is dedicated to victims of the sinking. "I thought an Orthodox rabbi would be disapproving. But I found this loving guy, who could not have been more enthusiastic," Buxton said.

Simcha Jacobovici (above)to shoot new documentary. Theresa Tova (right) stars in Bloor JCC concert.

Even more enthusiastic, Buxton said, is his 83-year-old father, Michael, who left Romania for England in 1936. "This is the best thing I have done for him since the day I was born," he said.

More information about the project is available at the Web site www.struma.net.

Bloor JCC Concert: A cavalcade of well-known entertainers are gearing up to perform in concert to raise funds for a new 300-seat theatre slated for construction at the Bloor JCC later this year.

Performers include David Gale, Randy Vancourt, Molly Johnson, Marily Lerner, David Wall, Theresa Tova and Take Three Plus One, with the Bloor JCC choir.

The event "promises to be our best show ever," says program organizer Marie Lynn Hammond. "Everyone involved is really excited about the evening and the prospect of a new performance space at the JCC."

The Stars Celebrate Bloor 2000 may be the last big show to be held in the Bloor JCC auditorium. That facility is to be replaced by the Al Green Theatre, a versatile cultural arts centre providing space for film, drama, music and more.

Concert to benefit Matti Baranovski Fund

TORONTO — Northview Heights Secondary School is holding a concert of children's and adult's music composed and performed by Russian composer Vladimir Shainski.

Proceeds from the June 29 concert will be donated to the Jewish Russian Community Centre Matti Baronovski Youth Program Fund.

Baranovski, who was beaten to death last November, attended Northview. He was 15.

Many generations of children in Russia have grown up with Shainski's music.

The concert starts at 8 p.m. Tickets cost $18, $20 and $22, and can be bought from the school's office at 550 Finch Ave. W (416-395-3290); Finchurst Deli at Bathurst and Finch; Marks International Deli at Bathurst and Sheppard.

Not your ordinary museum

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

LOS ANGELES — It's a showcase for promoting human rights and advancing an understanding of the Holocaust.

The Museum of Tolerance, the educational arm of the Simon Wiesenthal Center, challenges visitors on two fronts.

It invites them to confront prejudice in all its permutations and offers them an opportunity to understand the greatest crime ever committed against the Jewish people.

Opened to the public seven years ago, the gleaming $55 million facility, far in spirit and distance from the seamy glitz of Hollywood, was definitely not designed to be an ordinary museum with the usual documents and artifacts.

Through the technological wonders of interactive displays, video monitors, films and graphics, it highlights two interlocking themes – the history of racism in the United States and the story of the Holocaust.

The museum, at 9786 West Pico Blvd., is essentially divided into two parts – the Tolerancenter and the Holocaust section.

An eye-opener, the Tolerancenter consists of several exhibits.

The Other America is a wall-sized, computer interactive map of 250 hate groups in the U.S., ranging from the Ku Klux Klan to Aryan Nations. It's clear that the wellsprings of hatred run deep in the United States.

Ain't You Gotta Right? documents the African-American struggle for civil rights through the medium of a 16-screen video wall. Martin Luther King Jr., the black leader, delivers a stirring speech. Blacks recall the struggle for equality. White policemen beat up black demonstrators in southern towns.

Pop Up Heads is a sardonic display about ethnic diversity in a society which usually describes itself as a melting pot.

Point of View Diner, the museum's newest exhibit, uses the latest cutting edge technology to convey the overall message of personal responsibility when it comes to tolerance.

In Our Time, a documentary on Rwanda, Bosnia and contemporary neo-Nazi organizations, zeroes in on human rights violations throughout the world.

Historic Milestones charts important developments in the struggle against racism, such as the establishment of the Fair Employment Practices Commission in 1941 and the debunking of the theory of racial superiority by famed anthropologist Franz Boas in 1928.

At once stark and fearsome, the Holocaust section drives home the point that bigotry, if harnessed to a fanatical political movement, can be downright catastrophic.

The Outdoor Cafe Scene is a re-enactment of a 1930s Berlin street in which people express their concerns about the growing strength of the often underestimated Nazi party, led by Adolf Hitler.

The Wannsee Conference refers to the January 1942 meeting, in an upscale Berlin suburb, during which the planners of the Holocaust laid out a plan for the Final Solution, the systematic destruction of European Jewry.

In the Hall of Testimony, a living rebuke to Holocaust deniers, Holocaust survivors tell their stories at regular times of the day.

At a computer work station, visitors can click into an exhibit on Jewish resistance during the Holocaust.

The Scroll of Righteous Gentiles, with the names of more than 8,000 Christians and Muslims who saved Jews at the risk of their own lives, is a reminder that the magnitude of the Holocaust could have been greater.

New edition for handy Jewish guide

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to the CJN

A 440-page soft-cover book, published by Vallentine Mitchell in association with the Jewish Chronicle of London, England, purports to be the most thorough guide available to the Jewish world.

Jewish Travel Guide 2000, edited by Michael Zaidner, is compact enough for travellers to carry in their luggage as they visit any of the thousands of Jewish communities it describes, in some 110 countries from Albania to Zimbabwe. The guide provides details of synagogues, cultural organizations, libraries, hotels, kosher restaurants and other institutions of immediate interest to Jewish visitors.

A capsule history is given for each country's Jewish community, and pertinent details supplied in context. The entry for Corfu, Greece, for example, gives a contact phone number and explains, "There was an ancient synagogue and cemetery here, destroyed by the Nazis." The entry for Majorca, Spain, reveals that the present-day Montezion Church "was the Great Synagogue of this capital in the 14th century."

The guide's treatment of Canada seems remarkably thorough, listing Jewish institutions from sea to sea, not just in the major cities but in many smaller centres as well. For instance, it details all four Jewish communities in Nova Scotia – Halifax, Sydney, Glace Bay, even tiny Yarmouth – and no less than 25 in Ontario.

The guide reflects the sad reality that small-town Jewish life has largely disappeared from Quebec in particular. Only three communities are listed for Quebec (Montreal, Quebec City, Ste. Agathe-des-Monts), the same as for Saskatchewan (Moose Jaw, Regina, Saskatoon).

Director's film debut wins award at Sundance Film Festival

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

Strange yet immensely satisfying, director Eric Mendelsohn's well-received film Judy Berlin has played in a couple of movie houses in Toronto since it made its Canadian debut in May at the Toronto Jewish Film Festival.

The black-and-white feature film, Mendelsohn's first, has achieved an impressive garland of good reviews and garnered the Best Director award at the 1999 Sundance Film Festival.

Director Eric Mendelsohn

During a recent visit to Toronto, the 36-year-old filmmaker explained that he spent 1½ years writing Judy Berlin, which chronicles a day in the life of a sleepy Long Island hamlet called Babylon on the day of a surreal, and seemingly never-ending, solar eclipse.

Perhaps Mendelsohn's most brilliant stroke of luck or talent was in casting such a superb ensemble – including Barbara Barrie, Bob Dishy, Edie Falco, Aaron Harnick, Madeline Kahn and Julie Kavner – and convincing each of them to work on an "experimental, non-theatrical" low-budget film at the lowest union rate of $87 a day.

"Casting is writing, as far as I'm concerned," says the Manhattan resident, who previously worked as costume designer on many films, including several of Woody Allen's.

"If you miscast a brilliant character, there isn't any amount of direction that will correct your mistake."

Kahn's performance, in particular, is a gem, and all the more precious because she died soon afterward.

How did the novice director persuade her to join the project? He explains that he got the script to her through a common friend, a costume designer. "She left me a message that she was interested in talking. She said she had never worked on anything like this at all. She had never done low-budget.

"We met in New York and talked over coffee about the script. She got to know me and I got to know her. There had to be this enormous trust and she was very careful about whether or not I was worthy of this trust, which I understood completely."

He says that the actors were particularly intrigued at doing something different; to his astonishment, he was able to assemble his dream-team of actors.

"I offered them something that isn't always offered to them, and I promised them a way of working that they would feel comfortable with, and I never reneged on that."

The film was shot in 30 days, during which Mendelsohn says he felt a prolonged angst, fearful that one of his actors would "walk" or that some other element would go awry.

He compares the nerve-wracking process to building a model airplane, when all the major components are held in place with elastic bands until the epoxy dries.

The editing process involved reconceptualizing the entire film, Mendelsohn says. "In editing we created a whole other movie," he says. "You have to keep looking at what you've actually got, rather than what you were going for."

The result is a quirky, intriguing, alternate film that is highly entertaining even as it turns its back on the need for a commercialized Hollywood plot formula.

Although Judy Berlin works well on its own refreshing terms, Mendelsohn speaks with frustration of his attempts to find major distribution for the film, even to get certain distributors to look at it. The "indie" road is a difficult path, he says.

Even so, he has begun writing his next feature. "It's called Delia – that's the main character's name– and it takes place in Manhattan. It's about a woman in her 30s who works in a theatrical costume shop, and lives on the fringes of fame and celebrity. It's about her attempts to change her position in life forever."

Mendelsohn cites numerous influences, including the plays of Thornton Wilder and the short stories of Shirley Jackson. "She's a great short story writer. It's her attention to detail and the accumulation of details that can be earth-shattering. You know why I like them? Because the way we live life is in the details. We don't often see big things happening to us. The changes occur usually in the details."

Some reviewers suggest that Mendelsohn was also influenced by Woody Allen, another Manhattanite who works with an ensemble cast.

"I've logged enough hours watching his films, so if he's an influence it was unconscious," Mendelsohn responds. "We spent lots of hours together on sets. We had a relationship and I'm glad to have been able to listen to him talk for many hours about what was going on on the set that day.

"When people say I've been influenced by Woody Allen, what I hope they mean is that my characters are mature people – that they are funny, passionate and complex beings, trying to figure out the world."

Jewish Travel Guide

All of Canada is covered, seemingly quite well, in only 12 pages. By comparison, the United States gets 135 pages, the United Kingdom 41 pages, France 36 pages, and Israel a surprisingly light 21 pages. Obviously, the guide is not nearly as inclusive in regard to the Jewish state as it is with most of the Diaspora nations.

Jewish Travel Guide 2000 is an indispensible resource for world travellers interested in visiting sites of Jewish interest or eating kosher at their destinations. To avoid kashrut-related confusion, an appendix supplies the names of kosher fish as they would appear on menus in eight countries, and in Hong Kong.

A companion volume by the same publishers, the Jewish Year Book 2000 is a detailed compendium of information about the Jewish community of the United Kingdom. It includes essays, obituaries, a who's who of British Jewry, organization addresses and much more.

Both books are available at Jewish bookstores.

Toronto centre leads Penn State to championship

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Alon Eizenman has had a season for the record books.

First, he scores 32 goals and 43 assists in 34 games to lead the Penn State Nittany Lion Icers to the American Collegiate Hockey Association (ACHA) National Tournament. Then, in the championship game he scores the winner – in overtime – to clinch the title against arch-rivals Eastern Michigan.

He's named ACHA Player of the Year and he wins the Bob Johnson Trophy, awarded to athletes who combine excellence in hockey with superior academic and extra-curricular performances.

In the middle of all this, he centres Israel's top line at the IIHF Pool D championships, and helps the Jewish state win its first-ever hockey gold medal.

Then, to cap it all off, Sports Illustrated includes him in its Faces in the Crowd feature, recounting highlights from his season.

Not bad for a Gretzky, but all the more impressive for an Eizenman.

The season had a lot of high points, acknowledges Eizenman, 21, and the SI feature "was a huge thrill for me."

On the ice, the best moment for him came during the final game of the ACHA tournament – the one that was decided in overtime. Sixteen minutes into the extra frame, Eizenman, a centre, took a faceoff deep in the Eastern Michigan zone. The puck went into the corner where Eizenman retrieved it and centred it to his winger. The forward's shot went wide but bounced out to Eizenman who had circled around the net. He picked it up and put it home for the tournament-winning goal.

"It was pandemonium," he recalls. "The veterans, me included, were not expecting to win. We're a close team so the absolute joy in winning was unbelievable."

It was, he said, the single most exciting hockey moment in his career.

Eizenman presaged that heroic effort with key performances in preliminary games. In the quarter-final,with the Icers down 3-1, he scored two goals to tie the game and send it to overtime. In the semi-final he scored the game-tieing goal with 1:37 left to play to again send it into overtime, where the Icers won again.

And then there was the tournament-winning goal.

His coach, Joe Battista, won't say he expected Eizenman's heroics, but he wasn't altogether surprised either. Eizenman, he believes, "is the best overall player in our league...He's creative, very unselfish, almost to a fault.

"He has tremendous skill, but probably the biggest thing is his vision. He sees plays develop and he can anticipate plays. He scores the kind of goals that make you go 'ooh' and 'aah'."

For his part, Eizenman believes his game has improved by leaps and bounds since he joined the Icers as a freshman three years ago.

"I like to think of myself as an all-round player. I can go on the ice in any situation. I can score or I can shut down the other team's players. I feel my game has grown in that way. I've always been a pretty good playmaker and defensive player; the goal scoring has come along."

Ironically, before he left Toronto, Eizenman had to beat the bushes looking for a U.S. college to offer him a spot. A product of the MTHL, at age 17 he had played Midget hockey for the Wexford Raiders at a time when kids his age were playing Junior.

"I sent out a bunch of letters," he recalled. "Major [NCAA] Division 1 schools don't scout Midget, just Junior."

Penn State, which plays in the second tier of U.S. college hockey, did send someone to scout Eizenman and, based on his scoring prowess, offered him a partial academic scholarship. Eizenman chose to head south rather than accept an offer to play Tier II Junior A hockey in Ontario.

Penn State is known for the high academic standards it demands of its athletes. Eizenman has excelled in both areas. "He's been a great role model for students who take seriously the terms, scholar-athlete," Battista said.

Turning his college success into a pro tryout was never his main intention when he headed south to Penn State. He plans to apply to law school but he's keeping his options open. He feels if he bulks up his six foot, 170-lb frame, the nearby Penguins might invite him to try out.

"If I'm afforded the opportunity, I'll at least try. If it happens, I'll give it a shot. I've never played versus the top players...I'd like to at least see how I stack up."

Battista believes that if he dedicates himself to a pro career, Eizenman has a shot. "He's fast, he's shifty. I believe he could play in Sweden or Finland if he wanted to."

To play pro hockey in North American, "he'll really have to make a commitment in the weight room."

Whatever Eizenman decides, Battista is just glad to have him back for his senior year next season. He's seen him "learn and mature and now he understands what it takes to be a leader at this level. He's competitive and he sets high standards for everything he does.

"It'll be hard to top his season, but you know what. I wouldn't put it past him."

Hear ye, hear ye. Trials are set to begin

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TAKE NOTICE

Young men and women in the Toronto area are being asked to get their briefs in order and present themselves for trial at the Esther Shiner Hydro Field.

They may attend in the company of a guardian or on their own, as their disposition will be at the discretion of judges well versed in the matter at hand.

Those who successfully pass their preliminary investigation will be remanded in the custody of their parents until their next appearance date, which has yet to be firmly set but is expected later in the summer.

Only those boys and girls with outstanding abilities in the game of soccer may attend the trials, which will be held on June 17 and 18, beginning at 9 in the forenoon.

Young defenders, midfielders and strikers born between Jan. 1, 1985 and Dec. 31, 1987 are eligible for the trials, which will determine finalists for Canada's junior soccer teams that will compete in the 2001 Maccabiah Games in Israel.

This item constitutes legal notice under the Charter, By-Laws or Constitution of any legally constituted and lawfully enjoined corporate and organizational entity whose Charter, By-Laws or Constitution entitles them to give legal notice.

Long-standing soccer maven David Rumack will be one of two coaches putting the boys through their paces at the soccer trials. He'll be joined by Yiftach Levy of Montreal, who will coach the boys team at next summer's Maccabiah Games in Israel. Valmie Ouellette of Montreal will be on hand to coach the girls.

Rumack suggested that those trying out for the outdoor soccer team would have some soccer experience at the high school or club levels, though that is not mandatory. Athletes may pre-register or simply show up at the field, which is located off of Bathurst Street north of Finch.

For more information, contact Rumack at 416-424-2525.

Inside Back

An abbreviated guide to Jewish history, part 3 (2171-2447)

By JORDAN MAX

2171 (1589 BCE) — Jacob, his Mama's boy, tricks Isaac into giving him his older brother's blessings and the keys to dad's donkey. Esau, who failed anger management school, is really ticked off and wants to kill Jacob, at which point Jacob decides to go on an extended vacation and while he's at it, pick out a wife or two.

Arriving penniless at his uncle Laban's house, he works as a grazing consultant (aka shepherd) for seven years to marry his younger daughter Rachel. Laban pulls a fast one and switches Rachel for Leah, his older daughter, which only proves that Jacob should have bought the shidduch insurance package in the first place.

Jacob marries Rachel and works another 13 years for Laban, while managing to have 12 children by four wives. After 34 years of being away, Jacob eventually runs out of clean laundry and leaves for his mother's house, taking his family with him. After an all-night mediation session, Jacob reconciles with Esau and settles down.

2216 (1544 BCE) — Joseph, Jacob's second youngest son and by far the flashiest dresser, so annoys his brothers that they sell him to some passing Ishmaelites going to Egypt, where he is again sold.

As he rises through the corporate ladder to become Potiphar's executive assistant, he is sexually harassed by Potiphar's wife, and unable to get good legal counsel, winds up in prison. Here he again rises to become head prisoner, a fancy title with a few perks but no additional pay.

Able to accurately interpret the dreams of other inmates, he is taken to the palace to interpret Pharaoh's dreams, and predicts seven years of surplus and seven of famine. Joseph is then chosen to be Pharaoh's Number 2 and implements Josephian economics (an idea later stolen by Keynes).

Joseph's brothers come to buy food, and Joseph tests their consciences, then reveals himself to his brothers, who immediately ask him for season's tickets to all the local sporting events.

2238 (1522 BCE) — Receiving the good news that Joseph is alive and Pharaoh's right hand man to boot, Jacob moves the whole mishpachah down to Egypt "just for a few years, until the famine finishes" and settles in the Goshen suburbs, a nice condominium complex with an adjoining golf course.

However, once Joseph dies, the new Pharaoh develops a sudden case of historical amnesia and gradually reduces Jacob's descendants to the status of slaves. Despite heavy manual labour and utter powerlessness, they are guided by their leader Xerox, and exhibit tremendous reproductivity.

2368 (1392 BCE) — In the midst of decrees of death against all male infants, Marvin, the third child of Amram and Yocheved, is born and is secretly kept until the photos come back from the lab. His mother places him in a basket in the Nile River, where he is found by Pharaoh's daughter, who re-names him Moses (thankfully) and raises him as an Egyptian prince.

One day, he goes for a royal "walkabout" session with his future subjects, and sees an Egyptian "workload motivational consultant" beating a Hebrew slave. In a fit of anger, Moses kills the taskmaster and flees to Midyan, where he marries Yitro's daughter Zipporah and begins a second career as an executive grazing consultant.

Later, God makes him an offer he can't refuse through a burning bush (a very neat trick at that), telling him to return to Egypt and to demand that Pharaoh release the Jewish slaves.

Moses submits his first proposal to Pharaoh, but faced with Pharaoh's "difficult" negotiating position, God softens up Pharaoh through ten plaques. Upon discovering the typographical error, God sends ten plagues instead.

About Teens

Dear Karilani,

After school one day, my friend was smoking cigarettes. She offered me one and I just ran away. The next day the same thing happened. I told her cigarettes are bad for your health and she said, "All the cool people smoke, why don't you?" I said no again and she slapped me and ran away. The next day she acted as though nothing happened. What should I do?

Hurt and Confused

Dear Hurt and Confused,

First, you should be congratulated on standing up for yourself. Sometimes that is the hardest step. You were right in saying no to the cigarettes. The issue that you have to address is whether you are more hurt by the way your friend acted towards you, or the fact that she may end up choosing smoking and those "cool" kids over your friendship.

You need to speak to your friend about this – quickly. If you don't discuss her actions, you will end up resenting her. After you said you weren't interested in smoking, she should have respected your decision. Furthermore, she had no right to slap you. You have to tell her how she has made you feel and that you are hurt by the way she has treated you.

You must also evaluate the friendship that you two share. How long have you been friends? Are you close? Is the friendship important to you? If your friend's behaviour doesn't change it sounds as though you both may go through some trying times. But if you really care about her and the friendship, then work at it, because once she realizes how ridiculous she is acting, she will come back to you.

Don't feel threatened by these "cool" people she speaks of. You have made the decision not to smoke and if you hold true to that, people will end up respecting you. However cliched the saying is, if people think of you differently because of your decision to not smoke, they are unworthy of your friendship.

Keep all of these issues in mind when you speak to your friend. You must express how you feel. Communication is very important in a relationship.

Karilani is a composite name for three girls, who are close friends and in Grade 12 in Toronto

PARLIAMENT HILL PROTEST: Concerned individuals protested their outrage last week on the steps of parliament at the ongoing plight of the 13 Iranian Jews. The protest was organized by the Montreal Board of Rabbis. The Ottawa Jewish community has been conducting daily vigils on behalf of the Iranian Jews in front of the Iranian Embassy. Verdicts are expected this week.

Calgary writer wins top honours

TORONTO — Nancy Huston, a Calgary-born author living in Paris, has won top honours and a prize of $1,000 for her 1998 novel The Mark of the Angel at this year's Jewish Book Awards.

Another 10 books were honoured at the 12th annual ceremony, which attracted some 200 people to the Leah Posluns Theatre in Toronto on June 7.

"This is my fourth year for sponsoring the award for fiction, and I'm exhilarated by the choice the committee made this year," said Beatrice Fischer, handing the prize envelope to committee member Bernard Katz, who accepted it on behalf of the absent Huston.

Winner of the Martin and Beatrice Fischer Prize for Fiction, Huston's seventh novel tells the story of a docile German girl who becomes housekeeper, then wife, to a Paris musician in the 1950s. Taking her husband's flute to a repair shop in the Jewish Marais district, she falls into a passionate affair with the instrument maker, a Hungarian-Jewish survivor of the Holocaust.

The Mark of the Angel was short-listed for last year's Giller prize. It is published in Canada by McArthur and Co.

Jewish Book Awards

"It's an amazing book, with vivid characterizations and deep echoes of the Holocaust," says Adam Fuerstenberg, the Ryerson professor of English literature who founded the Jewish Book awards in 1988 and who stepped down as its chair after the latest ceremony.

The event was distinguished by a reading from Chava Rosenfarb, the Yiddish novelist whose prize-winning works have chronicled the Lodz Ghetto and the vibrant Jewish life of Poland before World War II.

TORONTO — For the president of Israel's Supreme Court, the legacy of the Holocaust has not been bitterness or recrimination, but the triumph of the human spirit and a hunger for the pursuit of human rights.

Aharon Barak

Aharon Barak, a child survivor of the Jewish ghetto in Kovno, Lithuania, made that clear last Friday in accepting an honourary doctor of laws degree from Osgoode Hall Law School at York University.

"Most of my family was killed and I was saved by a miracle, by the grace of Lithuanian peasants," Israel's chief justice told over 300 new lawyers at York's spring convocation.

The News in Brief

CANADA

Goussinsky's Arrest

OTTAWA — Canadian Jewish Congress president Moshe Ronen has written to Foreign Affairs Minister Lloyd Axworthy to express concern over last week's arrest of Russian media baron Vladimir Goussinsky, who is also president of the Russian Jewish Congress.

"We are concerned for the well-being of Mr. Goussinsky. Our concern extends to the overall state of freedom of the press and human rights in the Russian Federation. The Russian government must be made aware that their actions will be held accountable by the international community," Ronen wrote.

BBC in Ottawa

OTTAWA — Officials of B'nai Brith Canada made a presentation to members of the House of Commons recently in which they urged legislators to make the Holocaust central to a planned museum exhibit on 20th-century war crimes. At the same time, the organization called on Citizenship and Immigration Minister Elinor Caplan to strip three Nazi collaborators of their citizenship and deport them.

Degree for Barak

TORONTO — The president of the Supreme Court of Israel, Aharon Barak, received an honorary doctor of laws degree from York University last Friday. Barak also addressed York University's Osgoode Hall Law School convocation.

Mission to Ottawa

MONTREAL — The Montreal Board of Rabbis recently organized a mission to Parliament Hill in support of the 13 Jews on trial in Iran. They asked the Canadian government to make clear that a guilty verdict will have serious economic and diplomatic consequences.

Philanthropy Awards

TORONTO — Joey and Toby Tanenbaum and MP Michael Wilson were among the recipients of the 2000 Philanthropy Awards, sponsored by the National Society of Fund-Raising Executives, Greater Toronto chapter. The awards honour excellence in community building.

ISRAEL

Weiz Loses Motion

JERUSALEM — A major hurdle has been cleared in the case of an Israeli soldier wanted in last autumn's beating death of Toronto teenager Matti Baranovski. Last week, Daniel Weiz, 19, a suspect in the murder, lost a legal motion in which he alleged that evidence against him was selective and perjured. Israel's Supreme Court rejected his claim and ruled that Israel does not need to request additional evidence from Canada.

PA's First Census

JERUSALEM — The Palestinian Authority's first Jerusalem census points to a higher Palestinian population in the eastern portion of the city than Israel has reported. The study says the Palestinian population in areas annexed by Israel after 1967 was 210,209, compared with 180,000 reported by Israel.

High-Tech Rating

JERUSALEM — Israel is the fourth most influential high-tech hub in the world, according to Wired magazine. Silicon Valley in California, Boston and Stockholm-Kista were ranked as the top three.

WORLD

Chassidim Attacked

NEW YORK — A stabbing attack by a group of Hispanics against four Chassidim in Brooklyn is being investigated as a hate crime by New York City police. One man was in critical but stable condition, and three in stable condition, in the incident on the Coney Island boardwalk.

Candle Fire Kills

NEW YORK — Investigators said candles lit for Shavuot helped to start a Brooklyn fire that killed the granddaughter and great-granddaughter of Rabbi Moses Teitelbaum, the leader of the Satmar chassidic sect.

Alarm Sounded

NEW YORK — Reform Judaism magazine is devoting its summer 2000 cover story to the problem of eating disorders, and draws attention to the "skyrocketing number of Jewish women affected by eating disorders. Eating disorders prey upon so many women... that we felt we had to sound the alarm," said Aron Hirt-Manheimer, editor-in-chief.

Protestors Fined

PRAGUE — Czech authorities last week fined nine "English speaking" Jewish protestors who ignored police requests to leave an office construction site located above a former Jewish cemetery here. Earlier in the week, three Jewish protestors were fined for trespassing at the same site on Vladislavova Street, which is half a mile from the city's famous old Jewish cemetery.

Valuable Judaica Stolen from Synagogue

TORONTO — A 40-year-old man is facing robbery charges after several Jewish artifacts were stolen from Beth Sholom Synagogue.

The four items stolen from the Eglinton Avenue synagogue include an early bronze Sabbath table lamp that dates back to 1670; a rare copper wedding ring from the late 16th century; a silver-filigreed Russian spice container from 1861; and a 19th-century German chanukiyah.

Police so far have been unable to find the items, which are described as extremely valuable.

Officials say the suspect had stayed at Beth Sholom during the winter when it offered space for the homeless. It's believed the items were stolen several weeks ago.

Investigators reportedly recovered a cellphone and several other items belonging to the synagogue when they arrested the man, leading them to conclude that he had already sold the remaining artifacts.

B.C. launches new Holocaust education guides

By MARLANE SMITH
Pacific Correspondent

VANCOUVER — Zena Simces chose her words carefully in a speech introducing and commending the B.C. government's new Holocaust education resources. Two words, especially, echoed hauntingly through the aisles of Vancouver's Holocaust Education Centre (VHEC) on June 12. Never again, she said firmly.

The hushed audience – comprised of Holocaust survivors, education ministry officials, educators and media – nodded unanimously in agreement. "Never again do we want to hear that a student is graduating in B.C. from grade 12 without hearing the word Holocaust," said Simces, chair of the Pacific region's Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC).

Two resource guides focusing on Canada and the Holocaust – one targeted for Grade 6, the other for Grade 11 – will be distributed to each public and independent school in the province by the end of June. Created by a writing team of members of the CJC, the VHEC, the education ministry and teachers, the guides are the tools that can ensure "never again," Simces said.

The CJC has made Holocaust education one of its highest priorities. With VHEC's assistance, they sent a proposal to the education minister. Now – one year later – the guides and teaching tools are ready to be distributed to all B.C. schools.

Material provided for grades 6 and 11

"In Congress' experience, it's one of the fastest things we've ever seen the government do," Simces said.

Robert Weisman, Vancouver Holocaust Centre Society president, greeted the announcement almost with a sigh of relief. "We've been voices in the wilderness for many years," he said. "For us survivors, it's gratifying to see this come to fruition, especially while we're still around."

But while the new resources are deemed viable and comprehensive ways of meeting the ministry's prescribed learning outcomes for grades 6 and 11 social studies, no teacher is actually obligated to use the guides. In fact, students may continue finishing high school without learning about the Holocaust because use of the new guides is at a teacher's discretion.

"There is no way we can ensure that a teacher uses these guides, or that a teacher addresses the Holocaust," said Greg Smith, the education ministry's social studies co-ordinator. "What we can do, however, is encourage teachers to utilize them and to create an awareness of this resource."

Smith added the new resource guides are endorsed by the education minister, Penny Priddy, who will send the new guides to schools under her own cover letter – something that doesn't often happen, according to the education ministry's curriculum branch director, Dave Williams.

Frieda Miller, VHEC's education director said the need for the new guides is enormous. Until now the only course potentially broaching the subject of the Holocaust was History 12, an optional course, where the teacher could choose whether to include any mention of the Holocaust.

Her recent experience with B.C. educators shows eagerness toward raising the subject in the classroom.

Barry Krangle, a grade 6 teacher in Sechelt, B.C., began teaching his class about the Holocaust earlier this year. Krangle said most children in his classroom had never heard the word and, if they had heard it, didn't know specific details about it.

Education systems under the Nazi regime inculcated hatred toward Jews because the Nazi state enlisted professionals and civil servants – including teachers – to carry out the final solution. "Education was one of the primary instruments used by the Nazis to segregate Jews," Miller said.

For that reason, Miller said it is particularly meaningful to celebrate the launch of the B.C. education ministry's initiative, which encourages teachers to examine the legacy of the Holocaust as a means of valuing diversity, human rights and social justice.

URGENT APPEAL TO HELP A FELLOW JEW BLINDED FOLLOWING A VICIOUS ATTACK

Mr Vizel, father of 17 children, was the victim of a vicious, senseless, anti-semitic attack in New York, that left him with severe head injuries and totally blind. As a result of the attack, Mr. Vizel is no longer able to provide for his family who now have the daunting responsibility of caring for their permanently disabled father.

No one should ever know the tragedy and suffering the Vizel family has endured and continues to endure. This once self-sufficient family has been reduced to relying on the generosity of their Jewish brethren for a meagre existence.

We ask everyone to help them in whatever way possible. There can hardly be a greater or more worthy Charitable donation.

Sincerely,

Toronto Rabbis: Amrom Assayag, Yeshua Fuhrer, Yitzchok Kirzner, Moshe M. Lowy, Shlome E. Miller, Duvid Pam, Baruch Taub & Dr. Allan Seidenfeld (campaign chairman) and Moshe Zolty.

Mail to: Dr. Allan Seidenfeld, 57 Timberlane Dr., North York, ON M3H 1J3 Attn: Y. Vizel
Please make cheques payable to MEOROTH or BNEI TZION.
All donors of $18 or more will receive a charitable tax receipt.

It's Nobody's Choice...
But Your Own.

Nobody can dictate which funeral chapel a family must use. By law, there are no formal or binding agreements between synagogues, burial societies, cemeteries, and funeral chapels.

Deciding on a funeral chapel is an important family decision. The decision is yours; the choice is clear.

Stratford's Fiddler superb

From the editor's desk

The famous and well-used stage of the intimate Festival Theatre in Stratford had been transformed into a replica of a turn-of-the-last-century shtetl in the Ukraine, run-down but not ramshackle, a busy meeting place and congested human thoroughfare right out of a Roman Vishniac photograph, its colours variations of earthy beige, brown, purple and blue.

The stylized urban horizon, suspended on the upstage wall, provided the wider context for the story about to be told: there were symbols of the ancient, comforting religion, fastidiously followed by the mostly impoverished Jews, alongside the onion-shaped domes of the Orthodox Church in whose high ceiling chambers the majority of the townspeople worshiped.

High above the stage, suspended in that urban horizon, as fixed reference points in a darkening constellation, were some of the familiar, dreamy images from Marc Chagall's paintings of shtetl life.

There was no doubting where the centre of our imaginations had been led. We were in Anatevka, awaiting the appearance of and the first piercing pulls of the violin bow by the fiddler perched precariously on the roof of one of the homes in the tiny, dusty village.

We stayed there, in imaginary Anatevka, for three hours. It was an enchanting, heart-breaking, uplifting visit.

For the first time ever, the Stratford Festival had included Fiddler on the Roof in its roster of theatrical offerings.

Who among CJN readers is not familiar with the story and the music of the Fiddler on the Roof? As everyone knows, the story in the play by Joseph Stein was based on the work of Sholem Aleichem. It is a magnificent tale and a magnificent script. It is also far more than a historical narrative of Jewish life in the pale of Russia one hundred years ago. It is a philosopher's journey that stops at and explores most of the essential points along the universal journey of life. Of course, the key exploration is the reconciliation between "old ways" and "new times."

The fiddler is the literary device, the metaphor for grasping on to our traditions. He is the invisible shadow following the central character Tevye throughout the play. He appears whenever Tevye's traditions are challenged or invoked.

The music by Jerry Bock and the lyrics by Sheldon Harnick are now part of the folk-lore defining Jewish identity in the late twentieth century.

The Stratford production was a superb, deeply moving experience, that splendidly conveyed the tenuous, bittersweet balance between the tears and the laughter in the daily lives of the play's central characters.

Without exception, the singing was outstanding, responding sensitively and evocatively, without affectation or strain, to the story being told in song. There are too many sweet musical moments in the play to single out just a few, but special mention must be made of Tevye's touching If I Were A Rich Man, of the ensemble's lovely harmonic layering of the Sabbath Prayer, and of the simple, poignant discovery in the duet by Tevye and Golda Do You Love Me?

The choreography was equally compelling, smooth and delicate or bold and aggressive as the story required, never overpowering the music and song but providing just the right visual punctuation and emphasis to the storyline. Among the choreographic highlights were the To Life/L'Chaim bar scene, the Fruma Sara nightmare and the bottle dance at the wedding, all of which were executed with dazzling grace, poise, drama and flair.

Of course, the real ballast and sturdiness of the production derived from the quality of the players. They meshed well; there was a patently obvious electric synergy among them on the stage that carried the play with high level energy, enthusiasm and commitment from the first curtain to the last.

The players were all a delight to watch. Unfortunately, space does not permit a more particularized tribute to them. But I do wish to mention three special performances. Michael Therriault was the perfect Motel, transforming the character, with humour and slapstick, from meek and frightened to manly and assertive.

Theresa Tova was a superb Yente, portraying her character with that finely measured patina of exaggeration that the role demanded to make it stand out as one of the fulcrum characters the playwright envisioned for the village community.

The dramatic anchor of the play however, was the remarkable performance by Brent Carver as Tevye. What room was there, I wondered, for the role between the zanyish portrayal of Tevye by Zero Mostel and the larger-than-life portrayal by Topol? It turned out, there was a great deal of creative and meaningful room left and Carver filled it wonderfully with a signature Tevye of his own: understated, gentle, quieter, more vulnerable, but deeply humane.

Carver's realization of the role was a visual, auditory and emotional delight.

The delivery of lines, the quality of singing and dancing, the mastery of facial expressions were extraordinary. Most extraordinary was his constant attention to the smaller but important details of each of his scenes as exemplified, even in the use of his hands. Carver often made heart-rending, dramatic statements merely with the sweep of his hands.

He clearly understood the complexity of his character, the poignancy of the story and the universality of its message. No single delivery of lines demonstrated this more than the way in which he painfully bade farewell to Chava in the last scene, by directing to her the weeping whisper of all generations : "God be with you." Stratford's Fiddler on the Roof is an exciting, stirring production, bringing new insight to the story and great credit to its cast.

Wolfe endows U of T Holocaust studies chair

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Jewish communal activist and former University of Toronto chancellor Rose Wolfe has created the school's first chair in Holocaust studies.

The Chancellor Rose and Ray Wolfe Chair in Holocaust Studies will endow, in perpetuity, a program that will examine the history, causes and consequences of the Holocaust.

The chair will be under the aegis of the university's history department. It will be awarded to a tenured professor with a known track record in Holocaust scholarship.

"Of all the things I could have done, this to me was the most important," said Wolfe, who served as the university's chancellor from 1991 to 1997.

U of T will become the second Canadian university to have a chair in Holocaust studies. The Silber Family Chair in Holocaust and Eastern European Studies was established at York University last year.

According to U of T, the Wolfe chair will be a critical link between the university and Holocaust studies taking place at other research universities around the world, as well as such institutions as the United States Holocaust Memorial Museum in Washington, D.C.

It will also work with related U of T faculties, such as arts and science, law, medicine and the Ontario Institute for Studies in Education – at both the graduate and undergraduate levels.

"We owe it to our predecessors, to ourselves and to future generations to understand what happened during that terrible period in human history," said Wolfe. "Most importantly, we must use this knowledge to ensure that such atrocities never happen again. If we fail one group, we fail all of humanity."

Wolfe is a longtime leader on the Jewish scene, having been the first and only female president of Toronto Jewish Congress (now Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto) and president of United Jewish Appeal's Women's Division. She's also chaired the Ontario region of Canadian Jewish Congress.

As a young social worker in 1947, she helped to place orphans rescued from European concentration camps in Canadian homes.

In a related matter, Wolfe last week said it was "unfortunate" that U of T awarded honorary degrees at its spring convocation to two well-known critics of Israel.

Pro-Palestinian professor Edward Said and U.S. foreign policy critic Noam Chomsky both received honorary doctorates, something "that showed real insensitivity to the Jewish community," Wolfe said.

In a June 1 letter to U of T president Robert Prichard, CJC Ontario region chair Keith Landy called Said and Chomsky "hard-line peace process critics" who have argued that the Olso peace accord "was an Israeli/American plot to deny Palestinians a credible state of their own."

Landy also pointed out that Chomsky once wrote an introduction to a book by the notorious French Holocaust denier Robert Faurisson (in which Chomsky defended Faurisson's right to free speech).

Landy wrote that he must "question the judgment" of the university in its decision to pay tribute to Said and Chomsky.

"Honouring academics who deal in absolutes, and demand that history provide guarantees, seem a strange message to young scholars," Landy stated.

In a reply, Prichard said the awarding of the degrees could not be reconsidered. "That fact does not diminish, however, my regret at any offence we may have caused you," he added.

New racist Web site launched as Heritage Front does upgrade

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — They're back.

Just when you thought the radical right had gone into a dormant stage or was too busy trying to stay out of jail, it has resurfaced on the Internet.

A new racist Web site called Anschluss Kanada (AK), has debuted while an old one operated by the Heritage Front (HF) has been upgraded.

Canadian Jewish Congress spokesman Bernie Farber believes the new Web presence signals a desire by some members of the racist right to resurrect a popular following.

Anschluss Kanada appears to be named after the 1938 Nazi takeover (Anschluss) of Austria. Its mission is to create "togetherness and union" and it describes itself as "a political, social and cultural information and e-news site that discusses issues of interest to European-Canadians, especially those of German descent."

It recently addressed the case of Nazi collaborator Helmut Oberlander, the retired Kitchener builder who served as an interpreter in a notorious German murder unit during World War II.

"It's a dark, bleak irony that today's neo-Nazis would support yesterday's Nazis," said Farber. "The shoe seems to fit."

Farber pointed out that The Freedomsite (www.freedomsite.org), which hosts the HF and AK sites, has been keeping racist sites going.

The resurgence of the Heritage Front site and the introduction of Anschluss Kanada may be the first stage of a right-wing revival, he speculated. "It's their first kick at it. It looks like they may be gearing up for a second coming."

However, times have changed since the heyday of the Heritage Front 10 or more years ago, he continued. "Their foot soldiers who were 18 or 19 are now around 30" and many have developed other interests.

In addition, the Heritage Front does not have the kind of leadership that once vaulted it onto the national scene. Wolfgang Droege, its past leader, has disappeared from the local racist movement, Farber said.

Farber added the Web sites mark an attempt to win over tech-savvy young people while still giving "support and succour to Nazi ideas."

El Al manager parachutes into middle of air war

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — On the ground, Israel and Canada are the best of friends, but in the air, it's war.

A war, that is, for the patronage and loyalty of the Canadian air traveller.

El Al, Israel's national airline, and Air Canada, Canada's national air carrier, compete head to head for travelers to and from Israel. Behind the scenes, Canada and Israel are in the midst of tough negotiations to update a civil aviation agreement that would set the number of flights per airline between the two countries.

Into the midst of this situation, Rami Fischer has landed. Fischer became general manager for El Al in Canada on Jan.23, taking over from Moshe Shamai, who was promoted to a head office job in Israel.

Prior to this, Fischer spent six years in Los Angeles and one year at head office in Israel.

For Fischer, his first six months in Canada have been both the worst of times and the best of times.

On the one hand, Air Canada continues to expand its service to Tel Aviv, offering nine summertime flights per week to El Al's four. The Canadian air carrier is looking to increase that number. During the winter, it offered seven flights per week to El Al's three.

On the other hand, El Al's flights in May and June – "usually weaker months" – have hovered at 95 percent capacity, while flights in July and August are expected to be completely booked, Fischer said. The situation is so good, he has asked head office to boost capacity by replacing the originally scheduled 767s, which carry 200 passengers, to 747s, which carry 400.

Moreover, El Al has succeeded in revamping its image and luring back passengers who had left the airline because of dissatisfaction with its service.

El Al recognized the problem several years ago and responded to passengers' concerns by making all flights to and from Israel non-smoking and by increasing the room between rows. El Al also worked hard to make passengers more comfortable, even offering 28 choices of kosher food, Fischer said.

Rami Fischer

In addition to the return of large segments of the airline's traditional Jewish market, El Al has made inroads among Christian pilgrims eager to visit the Holy Land, especially in the wake of the Pope's visit, Fischer said.

Still, there have been some causes for concern. In January, El Al dropped its Montreal to Tel Aviv flights, prompting an angry response from some quarters.

"We heard a lot from Montreal Jews, but we saw the numbers," Fischer said. "They were sharply down from the Montreal area and exactly the opposite of Toronto...At the end of the month, we have to pay the [bills]."

The Montreal falloff was part of a three to four-year trend, added Stanley Morais, El Al's sales and marketing manager. Despite dropping the Montreal route, El Al has seen the total number of passengers increase year over year, and the airline expects that trend to continue into 2001.

Nevertheless, its competition with Air Canada is causing concern. Air Canada is demanding a big jump in the number of its Israel flights and last November, Canada threatened to prevent El Al from overflying Canadian airspace en route to the United States unless it agreed to up Air Canada's winter 2000 flights to Israel. Israel buckled under the pressure and Air Canada boosted its nonstop flights to Israel to seven from five.

As far as Fischer is considered, Air Canada is not playing fair – a complaint heard from domestic and other foreign airlines as well. Last week, Air France and British Airways complained to the Senate committee on transportation and communications that Air Canada is using its clout with travel agents to freeze them out of the Canadian market and reduce competition.

Fischer said Air Canada loads its planes with American passengers and ferries them to Israel via Toronto. We "assume it's about 70 percent U.S. passengers," he said.

Fischer further contends that Canadian passengers are subsidizing the Americans sitting next to them. Americans flying from New York to Israel via Toronto pay only $499 US while Canadian passengers who board the same flight in Toronto pay $1,300.

Air Canada spokesperson Sandy Dexter said "it's quite normal when you have U.S. cities close to the border, they prefer to fly on a Canadian carrier...It sounds similar to the situation in Vancouver where it's cheaper to purchase a ticket to Asia in Seattle" than in Canada, she said.

"The market in Seattle is extremely competitive so we have to be competitive with those prices. That would be true in the east as it is in the west."

Morais suggested that if Air Canada gets its way and "increases the frequency of its flights, it can cut prices and get the market...El Al can't compete on the number of flights. The market is too small."

"El Al wants to see a real competition based on the number of Canadian passengers, so that both airlines develop Canadian passengers and not be based on traffic from outside of Canada," Fischer said.

Meanwhile, during a recent trip to Israel, Air Canada president and CEO Robert Milton said he was confident a new civil aviation agreement would enable Air Canada to increase its flights. "The Canadian government has been very supportive of us," he is reported as saying.

To the teachers, we owe a great deal...

One of our ancient, great and insightful sages, Rabbi Eleazer ben Shammua, was of the view that we should revere our teachers as we revere heaven. Unfortunately, in an age when reverence for heaven is slight, and becoming it seems, even slighter, Rav Eleazer's formula may yield very little reverence for our teachers. And that would be a terrible state of affairs for us as parents and as a society.

Rav Eleazer understood very well and very clearly that the fundamental building block for a good, decent, civil and humane society was the imparting of knowledge and values to the next generation through learning and study. But without teachers, there can simply be no long-lasting, effective learning and study, and thus neither, the critically vital imparting of knowledge and values to our children.

Therefore, in the infinite line that we call human existence, the student's teachers stand alongside the student's parents.

The torch of goodness and enlightenment that one generation passes on to the next, would be nothing more than a dimly glowing ember but for the efforts and the labours of our children's teachers.

We owe them a great deal. It is appropriate at this time of year, when the academic year is reaching its end, that we acknowledge that debt.

...for our children, we feel a great pride

But a teacher without a pupil teaches no one. Thus, the labours and the efforts that have brought our children to the end of the school year must also be recognized and appreciated. Many are graduating to different schools and to different, more complicated stages in their young lives.

The uncertainty of the future will undoubtedly unnerve a great many of our children as they cast their eyes forward to a new horizon. Until that horizon becomes more familiar and thus, less unnerving to them, we must unfailingly offer our children the encouragement, support, promise and confidence that one day they will touch even that far-off place. And we must also express our feelings of great pride in all the accomplishments that they bring to this memorable day.

Graduating from one grade to a higher one, from one school to the next one, or from school to employment, is an immensely worthy accomplishment. It evokes in us, as parents or simply as interested observers, powerful emotions of pride and gratitude and moves us to say to our children: thank you, too.

ON TRIAL IN IRAN

The trial of the 13 Iranian Jews on charges of espionage resumed behind closed doors on May 1. Each of the accused has a name. Let us not forget them.

Applaud, but with reservations

I guess the report that Israel has received conditional approval to join one of the regional groupings of the United Nations should be applauded, but with some reservations. Since attaining membership in the United Nations, Israel has been subjected to a slew of racist and biased resolutions.

That countries headed by murderers and despots have full membership in the United Nations demonstrates the hypocrisy that has permeated that organization for years.

Probably, the leaders of totalitarian countries fear the introduction of another state committed to democracy and human rights and, of course, the last thing those countries need or want is more democracy.

I heard the shofar cry

I had the privilege of accompanying a wonderful group of teenagers on the March of the Living 2000. We had exhaustingly long days and emotionally charged events. The tone of the journey was set on the second day, as we arrived in Auschwitz to start the March.

I am positive each of the participants has a moment in time to lock away in his or her own special time capsule.

Mine is when our contingent silently gathered around one another in Auschwitz as Irving Eisner (one of our marvelous survivor participants) slowly climbed atop a stone structure. He raised his shofar to his lips, and with great care and solemnity, he inhaled the air he would require. The quiet was deafening, all eyes and attention turned to this man who had survived the worst that could befall humankind.

Mr. Eisner exhaled and the shofar wailed, a lament for all those who didn't survive. We stood in awe as the shofar sounded its mournful tune.

The tears rolled silently down my cheeks and a chill enveloped me — I heard the shofar cry.

Inaction over Iran intolerable

Sandy Stern says it all (CJN, Letters to the editor, June 8) and it is frightening.

Hitler didn't get any resistance from the Jews, so he continued his bloodthirsty attacks on us.

We held meetings behind closed doors.

What is stopping us now?

We should put away our fears and get out and march for our 13 Jews. How do they feel about our inaction?

Holocaust centre seeks survivors from Romania and Transnistria

The Montreal Holocaust Memorial Centre (MHMC) is preparing a commemoration dedicated to the Jews of Romania who perished at the hands of the Nazis and their collaborators during the Shoah. If you are a survivor of Romania or Transnistria, or the child or grandchild of a survivor, your history (or your parents' or grandparents' history) of the Holocaust is extremely important to the MHMC. The commemoration program, to be held on Sunday, Sept. 24, will integrate survivor testimony.

Please write or call the MHMC before Aug. 1. Write to The Montreal Holocaust Memorial Centre, 1 Cummings Square, 5151 Cote St. Catherine Road, Montreal, Quebec H3W 1M6, phone: 514-345-2605, fax: 514-344-2651, e-mail: karent@fedcjamtl.org. A member of the MHMC will contact you to gather the information.

MORDECAI GEBIRTIG

The following is the first of a two-part series on the Yiddish folk poet, Mordecai Gebirtig, in commemoration of his death on 19 Sivan (June 4) 1942. Part 2 will be published next week.

By SIMCHA SIMCHOVITCH

Mordecai Gebirtig is one of the most popular and beloved Yiddish folk poets of our time. His songs were widely known and sung by the common people and professional singers alike. He was a simple man endowed with an unusual poetic and musical talent and a rare, gentle soul, permeated with compassion for every living person, Jew or non-Jew alike.

He was especially moved by the plight of the weak and subjugated in society: the orphan and the widow, the women wronged by men, the workingmen and the unemployed. All these compassionate feelings were illumined by his gentle humour and deep belief in the sanctity of human life. No wonder, therefore, that the people received his songs so warmly and considered him their singer and spokesman.

Between the first and second world wars Gebirtig's songs resounded in Jewish cities and towns all over Poland; and they were carried overseas, in the Americas, Palestine and elsewhere, both by simple folks as well as by Jewish singers and performers. After the Holocaust a miraculous revival occurred – his songs continued to be sung not only among the Jewish people, but worldwide.

Gebirtig's real family name was Bertig and he was born in 1877 in Krakow, where he lived all his life, and where he was murdered by the Germans at the age of 65. His parents were working people and at the early age of 14, he was given into apprenticeship to a carpenter.

In 1901, he opened his own small carpenter shop, but after a few years he was forced to give it up due to his poor health. He suffered a heart attack and was hospitalized for some time until he recovered. He then came to work as a restorer of used furniture in the store of his brother, Leon Bertig. There, in a small, darkened corner of his brother's store, he worked for years until his untimely death.

In 1909 Gebirtig married Bluma Lindenbaum, the sister of his brother's wife, who bore him three daughters: Shifra, Eva and Lola. The fourth daughter, Rosa, died in infancy in 1915. Having to provide for the enlarged family, Gebirtig was forced to work long hours and was, therefore, able to devote himself to his literary and musical vocation only in the rare hours after work or on weekends.

For several years, between 1904-1906, Gebirtig was also engaged in Yiddish theatre in Krakow; he played and directed theatrical works of Shalom Aleichem and others, and earned favourable reviews in the Yiddish press. It seems, however, that after his illness he resigned from his theatrical career and devoted himself entirely to his literary-musical vocation.

Gebirtig wrote his lyrics in longhand while his wife and daughter helped him in the composition of the melodies to his songs. He did not read musical score and the only instrument he played was a fayfl – a little flute.

Luckily, Julian Hofman, a close friend of Gebirtig and a professional musician, wrote down the musical notes to Gebirtig's songs. Thus, they were copied by hand and spread far and wide over Poland. In 1921, the famous Molly Picon visited Krakow and obtained from Gebirtig the now widely known songs Kinder Yorn and Hulyet, Hulyet Kinderlekh for her repertoire. In 1923, the same songs were incorporated in the popular operetta The Rumanian Wedding. Thus Gebirtig's songs became known to wider audiences in Poland and in the United States.

In 1920, when Gebirtig was 43 years old, a number of his Krakow friends and admirers published his first collection of poems titled Folkstimlekh (For Plain People). This was a modest booklet of 32 pages, containing a selection of his writings – all in all 20 poems without music.

Sixteen years later, in 1936, a committee of his Krakow friends published Gebirtig's second collection titled Mayne Lider (My Songs). It included 51 new poems plus two revised ones from the former publication, all of them with musical score. The book also contained an introduction written by the music scholar and folklorist Menakhem Kipnis, who proclaimed Gebirtig "an authentic and God-blessed folk poet and folk singer."

Gebirtig drew the themes for his songs from everyday life around him. He pitied the working man who toils all his life, creating the riches of the world while he himself lives in poverty and in need; or the working father who has no time to spend with his child; or the unemployed who, after long years of toil, are forced to carry on a pitiful existence.

With great compassion Gebirtig tells the story of Avreml Marevikher (Avreml the Thief), a clever pickpocket and jolly fellow, who wastes his abilities on stealing (mind you, only from "misers, the filthy rich") and then languishes for years in jails. In the final stanza, Gerbirtig writes:

Here lies Avreml, a most able thief,
he might have become a great man, a fine man, hearty, sensitive and pure,
as God would have liked him to be,
if only a mother's eyes could have watched over him,
if the dark streets hadn't raised him when still a child, a father he would have, here lies Avremi, a real jolly fellow.

With the outbreak of World War I, Gebirtig was mobilized for work in a military hospital in Krakow. During those years he wrote a number of anti-war songs, some of them included in the two editions of his poems. In the poem Hershele, Gebirtig tells the children that they may play any game they wish but not the game of soldiers because Hershele, the little orphan, lost his father in the war.

Please don't wake in his heart the pain he still feels, — because, you see, his father played the soldier game.

They gave him a rifle and sent him into battle,
a short letter was delivered:
"He fell like a hero" …

And in the song An Invalid of War the blind man's girl sings:

My dear father wasn't born blind,
he spent a long time on the battlefield,
that's where he lost his eyesight, ended up bringing home a war medal.

Exceptional are Gebirtig's songs about children in which he penetrates the innocent and playful world of the Jewish child. In the song My Father A Cohen, Avreml gave the Cohen's son a hard push. But, as it is well known, to start up with a Cohen is no joke. A Cohen in Jewish folklore is an angry man, "he'll rip up a person/ when he gets his temper up."

But luckily for Avreml,
just at that time
his sick father had passed away, how fortunate is he!

Because a Cohen must not enter the house where a corpse lies – beat me up again, do you think always such a miracle would happen?

This child's reasoning reminds us of Shalom Aleichem's Motl, the cantor's son who declared, "I'm well, I'm an orphan."

In another song, Avremele and Yosele, Yosele tries to persuade Avremele to skip the religious school, the cheder, and follow him into the field where the sun shines so brightly, and birds and butterflies zoom in the air. But Avreml is more of a realist and reminds Yosele that tomorrow the rebbe will find out the truth. To this Yosele replies:

Avremele, O little fool,
don't worry at all about tomorrow, excuses are easy to come by,
one only has to be a little clever – look how that bird flies!
Don't worry about tomorrow.

Avremele, however, doesn't let himself be lured and says:

O Yosele, I'm warning you,
don't go, on my word as a Jew.
Satan has disguised himself as a bird, there in the field, and tries to drag and pull us there –
don't go, on my word as a Jew.

In the end, the two friends part – Avremele goes to school and Yosele proceeds into the field.

Gebirtig's gentle and moving love songs, such as Reyzele or Baym Taykhele (Beside the River) have a special charm. In Reyzele, the beloved asks her Dofidl not to whistle anymore because her mother thinks it's not proper for a Jewish boy to do so. Dovidl promises from now on to be good and pious and, for her mother's sake, he'll even attend the prayerhouse every Saturday. For this Reyzele promises Dovidl to knit a tfillin bag for him with a little Star of David on it.

And how lovely and gently Gebirtig handles the erotic theme in Baym Taykhele. A boy is lying by the river when a maiden appears to bathe in it. The girl feels ashamed before the young man and warns him not to look on. The boy promises in good faith, to cover his eyes and not glance at her. However, the girl is not satisfied and says:

I don't believe you, my dear boy,
swearing's not hard to do,
you often swear, we believe you,
then find out you've cheated us.

In the end, the boy cannot endure it any more and pleads with the girl to come out of the river, but she warns him again:

Don't look, don't look, dear boy,
I'm coming out of the river.

In quite a number of poems, Gebirtig tells of the fate of young women who were cheated, seduced or jilted by their lovers or grooms. He does not omit the joy, intermingled with sadness, of Jewish parents who marry off their daughters, as in the song Dray Tekhterlekh (Three Daughters).

Close to his heart is the sighing of the old couple who long in their sleepless nights for their noisy children, now grown up and far-away from home.

In spite of Gebirtig's hard life and the serious content of most of his songs, we can still find a number of humorous poems, such as Nokh a Glezl Tey (Another Cup of Tea) in which the pregnant wife is arguing with her husband after whom to name the child soon to be born. The quarrel is resolved when the husband states:

But why should we quarrel now and waste our time talking?
We could even have twins –
even two baby girls.

Similar is the song Khvil Nisht Aza Khosn (I Don't Want Such a Bridegroom). Here, the bride is too choosy, she doesn't like the first two young men the matchmaker offered her because of their common Jewish names, and the third one she dislikes because he speaks Yiddish.

Finally, the matchmaker finds a bridegroom to her liking, but there is a snag: his mother's name is Sarah, just as is the bride's name which, according to a superstitious belief, is to be avoided. The unlucky bride concludes sadly:

Even when God sends me someone,
it turns out a disaster,
is my name Sarah.
Woe is me, dear mother,
O dear mother.

Decalogue dramas

Most readers of this column are probably much more familiar with television films than I am. In the past, I seemed to find very little time to spend in front of the tube; my wife and I have always preferred reading to viewing the uncertain offerings presented on television.

Rabbi Gunther Plaut in Toronto

But personal circumstances have lately drawn me into the circle of those who pay attention to some of the films mentioned in John Doyle's critical film reviews in the Globe and Mail.

The other day I was lucky and tuned in to a show called Decalogue. I saw two riveting present-day dramas, expertly written and splendidly acted. Most 1½-hour-long films deal with clearly emerging themes, but it took the person who introduced the show to call the viewer's attention to the biblical Decalogue.

The first film dealt with a father and his son, both immensely attractive persons, portraying an intimate intellectual and emotional relationship that one seldom sees. Father and son are expert in using computers, and the father, a teacher at a university, is, like his son, enormously attractive in the way he speaks and acts. The tragedy that ensues arises from his reliance on what the computer tells him. Nowhere in the show is the underlying theme even mentioned: that computers and for that matter science in general, do not hold the ultimate answers to what we deem truly important in life. Without the announcer's introduction, I would not have related this show to the first commandments: "I am the Lord your God" and "You shall have no other gods before me." (The show follows the Christian way of numbering these commandments as one.)

The second show deals with the commandment: "You shall not take the name of the Lord your God in vain." It features a doctor and a pregnant woman who wants to know whether her husband, presently in hospital, will live or die. If he dies, she will carry her baby to full term, but if he lives, she will have an abortion, for the child was fathered by another man. She insists that the doctor must tell her what the fate of her husband will be, and she wants him to swear by his judgment. He finally does — using God's name in vain — with startling consequences arising.

This show was made in Poland, and is presented with English subtitles. If you ever have an opportunity to see this offering, do not miss it. For me, it was riveting — and not because I am a rabbi for whom the Decalogue is no stranger.

High-speed train never leaves the station

This month, the National Planning Council approved the construction of a new, much-needed high-speed railway line connecting Jerusalem and Tel Aviv via Ben-Gurion Airport. For several good reasons, such long overdue news should have made major headlines and been the cause of celebration. For several equally good reasons, that was not the case.

Robert Sarner in Jerusalem

For all of Israel's cutting-edge prowess in the high-tech sector, it's still mired in the mid-20th century when it comes to public transportation. The most flagrant example is the rail system that, among other things, offers no train service between the country's two largest, most important cities.

In such a highly opinionated, deeply divided nation as Israel, few issues command a broad consensus. This is one of them. Indeed, virtually nobody contests the need for an alternative to cars and buses – the source of horrific pollution, time-wasting traffic jams and thousands of accidents every year.

For decades, politicians have paid lip service to the desirability of an efficient rail line linking the capital with the country's business and cultural hub. Who could argue? But, as with the much talked about and often promised Tel Aviv subway, nothing was done. Now, the tide may be turning. Perhaps.

The recent announcement of a new Jerusalem-Tel Aviv train line raises hopes.

But with no date indicated for the beginning of work nor details given on the budget, people are understandably skeptical.

They've heard it all before. Invariably, bureaucratic wrangling rules the day as such projects are hijacked by political considerations that divert budgets for more expedient expenditures – like more roadways. The result: As the country is being paved over, the Jerusalem-Tel Aviv train never leaves the station.

Two years ago, the already neglected train service between the two cities – pitifully slow and infrequent – was closed down completely following numerous derailments. By then, its use was relegated to mostly diehard rail enthusiasts willing to accept the appalling conditions and the two-hour journey, more than twice the time by car or bus.

In contrast, tens of thousands of motorists negotiate Highway Number 1 every day between Tel Aviv and Jerusalem, making the 55-kilometre stretch of asphalt the most widely travelled – and congested – highway in the country.

Ironically, while the train link between Jerusalem and Tel Aviv deteriorated terribly in recent years, the situation improved elsewhere in the country.

Israel may still lack rail service in some regions but the system is expanding and overall the number of people travelling by train is growing.

At a press conference this month inaugurating train service between Tel Aviv and Rosh Ha'ayin, the head of Israel Railways (IR), Amos Uzani, said he recently presented a five-year $1.8-billion (US) plan for railway development to the Transportation Ministry. According to Uzani, IR expects to carry 15 million passengers in 2001. The next move is now up to the government.

As a tiny, densely populated country devoid of mountain ranges and massive distances to cover, Israel is ideally suited for a high-speed train system.

With the nation's roads increasingly choking with cars and trucks, the benefits of an efficient rail network servicing all of Israel are obvious: less pollution, fewer highway casualties, an alleviation of traffic jams and better population dispersal. The dividends may be hard to dispute, but sadly, no one has been able to make it happen.

Decades of foot-dragging have kept a vastly improved rail system on the back burner, opposed by the country's powerful bus co-operatives and sidetracked by bureaucrats vying for control of the potential budgets. For most politicians, keeping new roads the priority seems the most direct route to voters' hearts. And keeping people in their cars assures the government of a steady flow of big money through hefty taxes on vehicles and gas.

But the price in human lives and environmental destruction for making Israel a more car-dependent society is staggering and increasingly apparent. If the solution is not revolutionary, the will to translate it into reality is.

It's just a question of how bad the situation has to become first before the government will have no choice.

Israeli deterrence remains strong

Has Israel gone soft? This seems to be the conclusion of the pundits, both in Israel and abroad, following the IDF's midnight exit from Lebanon.

Deploring the army's ignoble withdrawal "dragging its tail between its legs," the critics warn that for Hezbollah, this is a major victory. Now, they warn, the Palestinians, Syria and other opponents, past, present, and future, will seek confrontations with Israel.

Gerald Steinberg in Jerusalem

The picture looks even bleaker when coupled wih the restraint during and after the Iraqi missile attacks in 1991, and following the Palestinian suicide bombings, during both the Shimon Peres and Benjamin Netanyahu governments.

In the 1940s, Jewish underground armed organizations, such as the Ezel, Lechi, and (sometimes) the Haganah, would not have allowed such murderous attacks to pass without retaliation. In the 1950s, Ariel Sharon's Unit 101 made sure that any village or country that allowed its territory to be used as a base for terror would share the pain. While some of these retaliatory actions were poorly planned and badly executed, the overall policy succeeded in creating a powerful deterrent, and eventually provided security.

Now, it seems, Israel has lost its collective nerve. Instead of a tough fighting force defending Jewish sovereignty, the new generation of soldiers prefers to sit on the beach, surf the Internet and cruise the mall. The pictures and shouts of joy as the troops returned from Lebanon for the last time seemed to reinforce this image of moral exhaustion. At the same time, Hezbollah's leaders are delirious with victory, and encouraging the Palestinians to follow the same strategy.

While this picture seems bleak, it is also overly simplistic. Israel's strategic position is more complex and there are good reasons to be optimistic. The 18-year entanglement in Lebanon was the wrong war in the wrong place at the wrong time. Both politically and militarily, Israel is not configured to fight long wars of attrition outside its borders.

Guerrilla wars always give the advantage to smaller and technologically unsophisticated forces that are insensitive to casualties.

Now that Israel is out, morale is being restored, and the IDF's strengths and superiority can again be brought to bear. The very bitter divisions within Israeli society are being healed, and if Israel is attacked now, the country will be united.

Attacks from Hezbollah or by Palestinian groups in Lebanon will lead to a quick, massive and sustained response. No Israeli leader, and Ehud Barak in particular, can or will allow a return to the situation that prevailed before 1982, when Lebanon served as the base for brutal terrorism.

If forced to respond, Israel will follow the lead of the United States and NATO during the Iraqi war of 1991, and the more recent Kosovo campaign, and rely on precise use of air power. The retaliatory raids that destroyed power stations in Beirut and other parts of Lebanon were a strong warning and the message was received and understood.

With Syria paralyzed and preoccupied following the death of Hafez Assad, Damascus will be in no position to challenge Israel. Under these circumstances, which might last for many years, the Syrians will be wary of providing bases, training, and weapons for use against Israel. If Assad's successors encourage attacks from Lebanon, the IAF will also target Syrian assets. The recent bombing of the Damascus-Beirut road demonstrated that the transportation and communication links between Syria and Lebanon are extremely vulnerable. Without a functioning economy, no money to buy weapons or spare parts, and political uncertainty, Syrian military preparedness is low and declining steadily.

Under Assad, Syrian planning had been based on continuing to bleed and divide Israel through the war in Lebanon, and the withdrawal was a major strategic surprise. In comparison, no Arab regime has the strength to pull its troops out of a battle and survive. Suddenly, they realize that Israel has gained both the military and the diplomatic initiative. If anything, among serious people and not propagandists, respect for Israel's capabilities and ability to defend its vital interests continues to grow.

The Kirshner File

Assad changed, but couldn't take final leap

Hafez al-Assad, an icon of Arab nationalism and modern Syria's most formidable politician, died on June 10 without realizing a cherished dream – the recovery of the Golan Heights, conquered by Israel in the Six Day War while he was defence minister.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

Assad, who ruled Syria autocratically for almost 30 years, tried to regain the Golan by military and diplomatic means. He came relatively close during the first days of the 1973 Yom Kippur War, when the Syrian army struck deeply into the Golan, and again in the past seven years, when an historic agreement with Israel periodically hung in the balance. But now, with his passing in Damascus at 69, it will be left to Assad's son and heir apparent, Bashar, a bookish ophthalmologist and rank political novice, to try to close the circle.

A calculating, ruthless man who transformed Syria from a weak, unstable state into a militarily strong and politically assertive one, Assad was a charter member of the Arab Socialist party. The Ba'ath, as it was known, was animated by the principles of pan-Arabism, secularism, anti-imperialism and anti-Zionism.

When the Ba'athists seized power in a 1963 coup, one of many which had convulsed Syria since 1949, Assad was a senior air force officer. The new regime was headed by a radical army officer, Salah Jadid, who raised the level of Syria's anti-Israel rhetoric to a fever pitch and ardently supported the newly-formed Palestine Liberation Organization, particularly after the hanging of Israeli spy Eli Cohen in 1965.

Assad toppled Jadid in 1966, gaining legitimacy, in part, from his rejectionist stance vis-a-vis Israel. Many historians believe that Syria, goaded by the Soviet Union, whipped up the incendiary climate which catapulted Egypt into a disastrous armed confrontation with Israel in 1967.

Despite the loss of the Golan, Assad consolidated his position as Syria's unrivalled leader in a bloodless putsch in 1970, and named himself president a year later. For three decades, by the threat of the sword, he gave Syria, secretive and insular, an unprecedented run of stability.

Assad's detestation of Israel was rooted in Syria's history. Under the Ottomans, Greater Syria encompassed what is today Israel, Lebanon, Jordan and the West Bank. As a result of the 1916 Sykes-Picot accord, Syria was dismembered by Britain and France. During the 1920s, Lebanon broke away and Trans-Jordan was severed from Palestine. Turkey was awarded Alexandretta in 1939. Israel emerged from the ashes of Palestine, and Jordan went its own way.

Syria became a hotbed of anti-Zionism, and Assad, an Alawite in a mainly Sunni Muslim nation, was nurtured on the milk of these setbacks. Viewed from this perspective, it is hardly surprising that Syria would be Israel's most visceral foe. "Of all the relationships in the Arab-Israeli conflict, that between Israel and Syria has been the most burdened with hatred," writes Martha Neff Kessler in Middle East Policy.

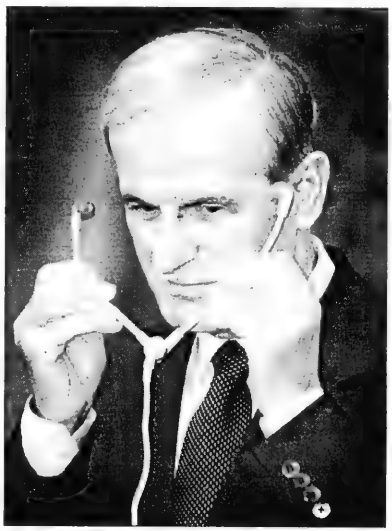
In 30 years at the helm, Assad went through basically three distinct but overlapping phases with respect to his attitude toward Israel.

Until approximately the 1973 war, which he launched in coordination with Egypt's Anwar Sadat, Assad was unflinchingly opposed to Israel's very existence. Chastened by the outcome of the Yom Kippur War, during which Israel rallied and temporarily occupied a further swath of Syrian land, Assad grudgingly resigned himself to Israel's presence in the region. Bending to international pressure, he explicitly accepted United Nations Resolution 242, promulgated shortly after the Six Day War. It called for the withdrawal of Israeli forces from Arab territories, and acknowledged the sovereignty, territorial integrity and political independence of every country in the area.

In this period, Syria demanded that Israel relinquish the Golan without negotiations. As Kessler points out in her monograph, Syria would not even discuss territorial adjustments, let alone a serious compromise. At best, Syria was prepared to negotiate a security arrangement once the Golan was fully restored. A formal peace treaty would have to be left to future generations.

Assad urged Arab states to stick together and refrain from signing separate and/or partial accords with Israel. Much to Assad's anger, Sadat ignored his admonition. In an enormous psychological and political breakthrough, he went to Israel to discuss the framework of a peace treaty. Subsequently, Yasser Arafat of the PLO and King Hussein of Jordan joined Sadat, thereby defying Syria.

For all his flowery words about Arab unity, Assad did not always follow his own advice. In 1975, following a brief war of attrition on the Golan and a month of frenetic shuttle diplomacy by Henry Kissinger, the U.S. secretary of state, Syria and Israel signed a disengagement agreement. Syria abided by its terms, and the border remained quiet. And through the good offices of the United States, Israel and Syria, in 1976, reached a "red lines" pact over spheres of influence in Lebanon. It buckled under the severe strain of a 1981 crisis which erupted when Syria placed anti-aircraft missile batteries in Lebanon's Bekaa Valley. Israel destroyed these missiles in a few short hours in the 1982 Lebanon War, during which Israeli and Syrian armour clashed in fierce tank battles.



Hafez al-Assad

With the help of its chief foreign ally, the Soviet Union, Syria attempted to achieve military parity with Israel. The effort failed and Israel remained the dominant regional power.

But in Israel's self-declared security zone in southern Lebanon, Syria conducted a proxy war against Israel through Hezbollah. With Israel's unilateral withdrawal from Lebanon on May 24, Syria lost a valuable trump card.

In the aftermath of the Gulf War, the Madrid conference and the dissolution of the Soviet Union, all of which occurred in 1991, Assad essentially reassessed his unyielding policy toward Israel. Though personally unreconciled to Israel's existence, Assad knew that Syria's fundamental political and economic interests could best be served if he engaged Israel in direct talks over the fate of the Golan. Syria was politically isolated, while its outmoded centrally-planned economy was in the doldrums. He needed the goodwill and financial resources of the United States and its Western allies to modernize and strengthen Syria. So he made a "strategic choice" in favour of co-existence, if nothing else, and agreed to conduct face-to-face negotiations with Israel in the search for peace. It was an objective Assad would have condemned as treasonous earlier in his career.

After eight years, the on-again, off-again talks – a watershed in Syria's bitter relationship with Israel – have yet to yield concrete results. Assad was an extremely stubborn negotiator, not only spurning Israel's request for confidence-building measures and public diplomacy, but also insisting on a full Israeli withdrawal to the June 4, 1967 rather than the 1923 international lines (which Syria considers a colonial diktat). Talks resumed in the United States last December and January, but foundered after two frosty sessions. Then, in March, President Bill Clinton met Assad in Geneva in a fruitless effort to convince him to compromise on the 1923 border.

On the eve of his sudden death, Assad was cast as a spoiler, a role to which he was very accustomed. Although he had come a long way in accepting Israel's permanence, he could not bring himself to take the final, daring leap.

This is the legacy that he leaves his young, untested son.

Jewish Life

Saving lives on the Net

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

The Internet is often criticized for being a worldwide waste of time. And far too often, those criticisms are completely valid. But used properly, the Internet can be a critical tool for joining communities and perhaps even for saving lives.

One of the ways people are drawing attention to their condition and their needs is by setting up their own Web sites. Dr. Jeffrey Bornstein suffers from chronic myelogenous leukemia, a fatal disease of the bone marrow. After it was determined that a suitable bone marrow donor could not be found in his immediate family, he broadened his search.

Bone marrow search page

Since the odds of finding a bone marrow match are best within the extended family, Bornstein's friends have built a family tree for him after searching vital death records, cemeteries and the Internet. With the help of Dr. Simon Kreindler, a friend of the family, and some important Internet contacts, they created the Jeffrey Bornstein Bone Marrow Search Web page [http://www.geocities.com/seflaum/Bornstein.html].

There was an immediate response. "We were inundated with e-mail from all over the world," Kreindler said. The Web site also helped mobilize interest in bone marrow clinics and gained attention from papers ranging from the Forward to the Raleigh News & Observer to The Canadian Jewish News [http://www.cjnews.com/ pastIssues/oct2199/ health /health.htm]. The search for a match for Bornstein continues.

One of the people who advised Kreindler is Stanley Diamond. About a decade ago, Diamond discovered that he is a carrier of a mutation of beta-thalassemia gene [http:// www.thalassemia.org/]. The gene does not affect carriers themselves but could be a "ticking time bomb" for descendants who marry other unsuspecting carriers. He warns that since beta-thalassemia is so rare among Ashkenazi Jews, there is a good chance of misdiagnosis unless families at risk are contacted. Children of two carriers have a one in four chance of inheriting the fatal disease, thalassemia major.

Diamond has spent years building his family tree and tracking down and warning other carriers. Along the way, he was founding president of the Montreal Genealogical Society [http://www.gtrdata.com/jgs-montreal/] and is project co-ordinator of the Jewish Records Indexing – Poland Project [http://www.jewishgen.org/jri-pl/].

Many of the lessons that Diamond has recorded on his own Web site apply to anyone investigating a genetic defect in their family [http://www.geocities.com/Heartland/Pointe/1439/].

One important article explains how to include medical information on your family tree – and even how to ask potentially difficult questions of elderly relatives [http://www.jewishgen.org/infofiles/genetics.htm].

Diamond warns against waiting. "The two words genealogists dislike are 'if only.' If only I had listened to Bubba when she talked about her youth… If only I had written down all those endless stories my father used to tell about his grandparents… It is no different for the family historian who seeks to record his family's medical history. Talk to the older generations now!"

Thanks to Diamond's dedication, more people are asking those questions and getting some crucial answers.

A guide to ethical living

The Book of Jewish Values by Joseph Telushkin, Random House, $44.95.

This book has been described as a "treasure trove of Jewish mentschlichkeit." It is a day-by-day guide to ethical living and a knowledgeable examination of Jewish ethical teachings and their application to daily situations. Divided into 365 brief chapters the precepts are presented as opportunities for enhanced spiritual insight and understanding.

Books
Bernard Baskin

Drawing on traditional Jewish sources as well as on the wisdom of contemporary sages and thinkers, the selections are replete with anecdotes, parables, aphorisms, humour – and sometimes, startling surprises.

Theological and abstract musings are blended with suitable examples and advice. The range of subjects is broad as life itself: the interaction between parents and children, husbands and wives, acquaintances and friends; the world of business; charity; concern for the aged, proper speech and controlled anger.

Here are some disparate questions for which the author provides answers. Is acting cheerfully a choice or a religious requirement? When, if ever, is lying permissible? What don't children owe their parents? What purchases are always forbidden? Should Jews donate their bodily organs? What should a guest say to a host? How can you teach your children the value of human life? Do you scream when you should? What should go through your mind when you hear an ambulance siren? Is there a limit to parental love? Is it ever appropriate to pass on a rumour? Should a doctor or a close family member tell the truth to a dying person?

All-in-all, the responses provided by Telushkin are concise, intelligent, sensible and not beyond one's ability to attain.

Here are some brief typical excerpts from the book:

"One rabbi I know prepares for Yom Kippur each year by writing two versions of his obituary. In the first, he sets down how he thinks it would be written, and in the second, how he would want it to be written. His goal, of course, is to narrow the gap between who he is and who he would like to be. So if, God forbid, you were to die today, what would your obituary say about you? Would it read the way you want it to read? And if not, what can you do now to change it?"

"As a rabbi who has had occasion to counsel congregants, I have come across people who spend hours a day thinking about the person or the people whom they most dislike. I don't know if their angry and often vengeful thoughts cause any tangible damage to the people whom they despise, but such thinking certainly ruins their days, and sometimes their lives."

"The Talmud enjoins us, just as the shattered remains of the tablets broken by Moses were regarded as holy and placed alongside the new tablets in the Ark of the Covenant, so too must we regard as holy and treat with respect those elderly people who have become intellectually broken and emotionally shattered."

The author of many books, including Jewish Literacy and Biblical Literacy, Telushkin has once again written a helpful work that touches the heart as it moves the reader to ethical concerns.

JEWISH EDUCATION
The Next Generation

One of the thornier issues in Jewish education is the concept of a chosen people. Are Jews different from other national groups? Unique? Superior? Labels of this stripe give rise to pride in certain parts of the community and queasy feelings of racism in other quarters.

But such questions are certainly not new in Jewish history; indeed they were often debated. Are Jews fundamentally different from gentiles? Is it mere cultural difference or is there a deeper, almost inherently biological difference – a Jewish versus a gentile soul? That difference would have enormous repercussions from a spiritual point of view.

The historian Jacob Katz, in his book Tradition and Crisis, traces these two radically opposed positions in Jewish thought. The first approach "grounds the difference in theological terms" and interprets the distinction between Jews and gentiles as a "mere divergence in articles of creed." Hence our souls are composed of the same spiritual potential, our humanity is of the same order. What separates Jews and gentiles then, is a divergence in what we believe and do in religious philosophy and practice.

Katz contrasts this with the other view, what one might call an "essentialist view" of certain Jewish thinkers, which argues for an inherent distinction between Jew and non-Jew. From this perspective, a qualitative difference is involved for which the individual was hardly responsible. That is to say, there is something intangibly but nevertheless actually "other" about the Jewish soul.

An example of such thinking is to be found in the well known medieval Jewish philosopher, Yehudah Halevi. In his famous work, The Kuzari, Halevi comes down strongly in favour of an essential distinction between Jew and gentile, even writing with respect to converts that "any gentile who joins us unconditionally shares our good fortune without however being quite equal to us."

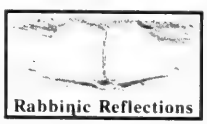
Maimonides, however, is largely a proponent of the first school of thought which sees the differences as one of thought and belief rather than genetics. He affirms that certain kinds of spiritual perfection are universally available. One's level of intellectual comprehension and moral perfection is what matters. For Maimonides there are no special genes in the DNA that spell J-E-W.

So clearly, how one views who and what a Jew is, especially in comparison with the rest of the world, will dictate how one understands the concept of a "chosen people." In Exodus 19:5, the Jews are described as God's treasured people, but in that context, maintaining the designation is contingent on performing the Law.

Do Jews maintain a claim to uniqueness if they show disinterest in or outright rejection of Judaism? This is a question that has become far more than theoretical, as this generation continues to test whether Jewish distinctiveness is a still viable idea, when Judaism itself ceases to play a central role for so many Jews.

Insomnia

By RABBI DAVID MERLING



Two weeks ago, we celebrated the holiday of Shavuot, commemorating the giving of the Torah by God to the Jewish people. Many have the custom of staying up the whole of Shavuot eve studying the Torah, expressing our excitement and joy at receiving this most special gift.

It is after all our heritage, the book of wisdom that defines us as a nation. God created a wondrous world for us, placed us in it, and gave us His holy Torah, the instruction manual for its proper use and care. Of course we stay up. How could one sleep while celebrating such a moment? And finally the morning comes, and we turn in after our early morning prayers, feeling spiritually uplifted albeit physically depleted.

There is another moving Jewish ritual, later in the calendar: the blowing of the shofar on Rosh Hashanah. Maimonides explains that the sound of the shofar is an alarm clock, awakening us from our slumber of habitude and routine, to take stock of our lives, of where we are headed and at what pace we're going there.

There is an old Jewish saying that links these two events to each other. Roughly translated, it says: A Jew goes to sleep on Shavuot morning, and wakes up to the sound of the shofar on Rosh Hashanah.

Cute, but there is a bitter tinge of truth to it. How ironic it is that we often spend our summers in spiritual hibernation, between such powerful religious experiences. The lazy, hazy days of summer remind us to exercise our flabby muscles, yet allow our neshamah to atrophy and our mind to take a three-month siesta.

There is a group of students in Montreal who organized an amazing concert that brought out more than a thousand young Jews to have a Jewishly uplifting musical experience. They called it "Wake-Up," because its mission was to arouse Jewish pride and identity in our often disconnected and dozing youth. It was a great success.

What they discovered after the concert was that although everyone "Woke Up," very soon they went right back to sleep! The next year they followed the "Wake-Up" concert with a "Stay-Up," an all-night learnathon that gave substance and value to the high that they experienced at the concert.

Only through education and by deepening our spiritual self-awareness, can we hope to keep up the pace. Let us not let the high of Shavuot night fall flat, until we're faced with the emergency last-minute call of the shofar. Let us take the inspiration and build upon it, and when the chill of fall sets in, we will welcome the shofar as a sound of victory, rather than be shocked by the alarm of judgment.

Good morning!

Rabbi David Merling is the rabbi at the Hillel Jewish Student Centre, and of Congregation Agudath Israel in Montreal.

Insured Annuities - Lifetime Guarantees of 10% Plus

In today's environment of low interest rates and volatile stock markets, many investors seek more attractive and less stressful investments.

If you are at retirement age and trying to maximize spendable income from non-RRSP savings, insured annuities provide the best of both worlds - significantly higher after-tax income for life and the capital guaranteed tax-free to your estate. The older you are, the higher the yield on your investment.

Consider the following example, which compares the investment of $200,000 in a GIC at 6% with an insured annuity, for a man aged 75

GIC versus Insured Annuity

	GIC	Insured Annuity
Capital	200,000	200,000
Annual Income	12,000	26,300
Taxable Income	12,000	6,600
Tax (50%)	6,000	3,300
After Tax Income	6,000	23,000
Insurance Cost	NIL	11,000
Spendable Income	6,000	12,000
Gross Equivalent Yield	6%	12%
Estate Value	200,000	200,000
Subject to Probate	YES	NO
Guaranteed Period	5 YEARS	LIFE

Effective improved yield on investment = 100%

Goldstein new head of Toronto Board of Rabbis

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The big deal about Rabbi Elyse Goldstein being elected the first woman president of the Toronto Board of Rabbis, is that it is no big deal.

"My being a woman is inconsequential to the election, and that is what makes it so nice," said Rabbi Goldstein, director of Kolel: The Adult Centre for Liberal Jewish Learning.

The board is a co-operative professional body of rabbis from Reform, Conservative, Orthodox and Reconstuctionist movements who work together to promote a united presence in the city, says Rabbi Goldstein, who begins her two-year term in September.

"We do not see ourselves as a legislative body. We do not do divorces or conversions, and we are not a Jewish court. We are a pluralistic voice of the community.

"Because there are representatives across the spectrum, we have a chance to listen to one another and find commonalities instead of differences," she says.

Rabbi Goldstein sat on the executive for several years and was nominated as president four years ago but she became president of the Reform Rabbis of Greater Toronto, so cut back her involvement on the board.

"It is historic that the board has a woman as president, but it was ready [for that move] four years ago. I declined the nomination," says Rabbi Goldstein.

Rabbi Goldstein

During her term she would like to create a mission statement, and would like members to study together in "order to understand each other's theologies. The more we study together, the more we can find common ground.

"By learning together, it will also be less frustrating when we cannot find common ground. We'll understand that if there is not way to find that common ground, we'll just move on."

In the past, she says, the board members have had many fruitful discussions and have come away with a deeper understanding of where their differences lie – whether these differences are social, halachic or historic. "If they are halachic, we agree to disagree."

The board is a collegial organization, she says, "and the more we work together, the more we can present a model of inter-denominational co-operation. I hope to facilitate that model here."

Although there are Orthodox rabbis on the board, she says, the Orthodox community in Toronto does have its own board – the Vaad Harabanim. "Cities do not usually have a separate Orthodox organization; rabbis come to the inter-denominational board. Most members of the Vaad do not come to our meetings. We would like to see everyone work together."

It is exciting for everyone, she says, to have a woman as president. "It shows that because we are a collegial group we can look at each other and say that we are equal rabbis among rabbis; women rabbis are equal."

At no time, says Rabbi Goldstein, did the board say that it is about time we had a woman as president.

"I was not nominated because I was a woman; it was a fair system. I was next in line in terms of seniority, and it was Reform's term to have a president. [The board alternates between Reform and Conservative presidents.] I was put on the slate, and no one had any issues."

The greatest tribute to how far our community has come, she says, is that when she arrived in the city in 1983, she was the only woman rabbi in Canada.

"It is wonderful, that not only do we represent the interests of different denominations, but that the director of a pluralistic organization is the president of a board of pluralistic rabbis.

"We want to be on the forefront, both reactively and proactively, whenever issues arise. We want to present a strong rabbinic voice."

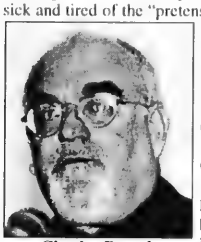
Children's issues focus of JF & CS annual meeting

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — In a blistering diatribe against what he terms "child policy abuse" and "neo-con games" at all levels of Canadian government, Charles Pascal, executive director of the Atkinson Charitable Foundation, told the recent annual meeting of Jewish Family & Child Service (JF&CS) he was sick and tired of the "pretense that children matter."



Charles Pascal

If kids mattered, he asked at the evening meeting, held at the Wagman Centre, why would the federal government have eliminated the Canada Systems Plan, enabling Ontario Premier Mike Harris to cut welfare by 21 percent unilaterally?

In Canada, he noted, 15.5 percent of all children live in poverty. In Toronto, the percentage is higher, he added.

The gap between rich and poor is growing, and kids are being left behind, he said.

If kids mattered, Pascal asked, why would we allow several levels of government to "tear asunder" universal health care?

"If children mattered, would we throw child-care programming and junior kindergarten to the wind?" Canada has the wealth to lead the world in early childhood programming, he said.

Not funding preventive programming is actually bad economic policy because of the amount of money that will be required down the road, he said.

It is unacceptable, said Pascal, that paper sold in Canada, containing chlorine, contributes to one of the highest levels of dioxin in breast milk. The 20 percent higher price for non-chlorinated paper would be mitigated by bulk purchasing, he noted.

If we love kids, why don't we have more employers with family friendly policies? he asked.

JF&CS has a one-year maternity leave with an option to return to work part time, it was noted earlier in the program by social worker Elinor Gertner, who was honoured for her 25 years of service to the agency.

Despite his pointed questions, Pascal, the father of a 5-year-old daughter, described himself as a "pathological optimist."

On a more positive note, he cited, among others, JF&CS "fighting intelligently for the kind of resources that could make a big difference."

He also told of his daughter's friendship with a playmate from a lower socioeconomic level. "That friendship hopefully will create the roots of empathy that will eliminate child policy abuse," he said.

JF&CS offered counselling and support to over 2,600 cases, among them 400 involving woman abuse, over the past year. The agency is continually responding to changing needs in the community, said Susan Maldoff, JF&CS president.

It has the equivalent of six full-time social workers in schools, acting as an early intervention system, she noted.

To deliver services more efficiently, JF&CS has moved toward services like solution focused brief therapy and group work, said executive director Gordon Wolfe.

Poverty and declining resources were among the top concerns he highlighted.

The agency has a balanced budget of $9.8 million for the past fiscal year. It receives over half its funding ($5.4 million) from the Ministry of Community and Social Services, $2.2 million from UJA FEDERATION and $1.5 million from United Way.

"Poverty is a reality in the Jewish community," Wolfe said. "When money stops coming into the home, there is a chain reaction. A common symptom is depression...Fuses are shorter and there's much more stress in the family, the more likelihood therefore of family violence, abuse of children and abuse of alcohol and drugs."

JF&CS has one of the lowest per capita rates of children in care in the province. "I'm convinced one of the major reasons we are able to keep children in their own homes is that we have a financial assistance program," said Wolfe. The program distributed over $1.5 million to assist more than 2,500 clients over the past year.

Pre-teen keeps busy pace

By ADAM SEGAL
CJN Intern

TORONTO — Twelve-year-old Phil Birnbaum knows what it takes to raise money for charity.

Phil, a Pleasantville Public School student in Richmond Hill, has been soliciting donations for cancer and multiple sclerosis research since he was just seven. Modestly, he says each endeavour he embarks on is just "one more good deed."

Phil Birnbaum

Scheduling an interview with the fund-raiser was tough. He had to slot me in between the nights he was honoured at Richmond Hill's Beit Rayim synagogue's Volunteer Appreciation Oneg Shabbat and the Multiple Sclerosis Walk Thank-You Dinner (for the nearly $6,000 he raised).

Of all the causes, dearest to him is his brainchild, Phil's Annual Cash for Cancer Raffle, which he started in 1999 in memory of his father, Perry, who passed away from non-Hodgkin's lymphoma four years ago.

Phil raised over 100 prizes and $4,300 for the raffle over the last two years. It involved long days and nights of hard work, but Phil says it was all worth it.

"I just think it's fun going door-to-door, asking people for money and ... doing something for the community," he says.

Roberta Birnbaum Cohen, Phil's mom, says she has always tried to teach her children that giving to others is an important mitzvah, but she quickly asserts Phil has taken the initiative on his own.

"I didn't sit down and teach him how to fund-raise," she says. He's a schmoozer by nature and would just go by himself and fill up his knapsack with donations.

His unrelenting nature, Roberta says, is what has enabled Phil to accomplish so much at such a young age.

"He's never afraid of anyone saying no to him," she says. "He believes in what he does so much that nothing can get in his way."

Phil's efforts have received considerable media attention, with write-ups in the Toronto Star and the magazine Canadian Living, as well as television appearances on Shaw Cable and Citytv news.

"The other day at school I had 30 or 40 people come up to me and say 'I saw you on TV,'" he says. "It was fun."

Phil has also spent several summers operating a pop stand at community baseball games and believes he is destined for a career in business.

"I want to be the next Bill Gates," he says. "But not [with] the whole computer thing."

ש"שאר ג'ינגו

מה יעשו הלבנונים?

שלום לרקטה

השיטה הישראלית

Palatniks say goodbye to Toronto

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — When Shakespeare wrote "Parting is such sweet sorrow," he must have had Rabbi Yaakov and Lori Palatnik in mind.

They are thrilled to be taking up their new position in Boca Raton, Fla., where they will be starting an Aish HaTorah presence.

At the same time, they feel very sad to be leaving all the friends they made at the Village Shul.

Although Lori Palatnik is a Torontonian, the couple met and married in Jerusalem. Thirteen years ago, they returned to Toronto, where Rabbi Palatnik was in charge of executive learning, a program offering religious study to business people, in a business office setting.

Some of those executives, together with a few other people living in the Forest Hill area, expressed interest in having a synagogue that would have an Aish HaTorah atmosphere – and the Palatniks took up the challenge.

"We didn't realize how it would take off," said Lori. What started in the basement of Beth Lida Congregation on Gilgorm Road developed into a renovated storefront in what had been a cheese shop on Eglinton Avenue – hence the affectionate name "Jews for Cheeses," Lori laughed. Last year, they opened their own 24,000 square foot building at the corner of Eglinton Avenue and Old Park Road.

But it is not just the stones and mortar that impress the Palatniks. It is the religious growth of the members of the congregation. "We are so proud to see how they are the teachers, the leaders, the ones inviting people to spend Shabbat with them. When we came, we were the only ones – now there is such a feeling of Shabbat."

Together with their five children, they have grown very close to the shul members. "We are like family," Lori said. "we would do anything for them, and they would do anything for us."

Rabbi Palatnik echoed her feelings.

"There was a lot of sadness, especially in making the decision," he said.

Nevertheless, they are excited at the new challenge. "People call us the 'crazy pioneers,'" Lori said. "There is something we do that's unique, and that's to start something new. We want to make a difference in people's lives."

Boca Raton is the fastest growing community for young Jewish families in the United States, Rabbi Palatnik said. They are drawn there by the pleasant lifestyle, the safety, the affluence and the prestige, not to mention the Jewish schools, kosher restaurants, and mikvah.

Boca Raton was one of the places to which Aish HaTorah had been considering expansion. Feeling that "the Village Shul congregation loves us – but they don't need us as much any more," the Palatniks took several trips to Boca Raton and decided that they could make a contribution.

They plan to begin by teaching and studying in different people's homes, having families over for Shabbat, and generally meeting the community and becoming known.

Rabbi Palatnik said that "We don't have a set rigid plan. When we get to know the community, we will see what we can offer them – perhaps a shul, or it may be just a learning centre."

They don't see that they are saying a complete farewell to Toronto. Besides the fact that Lori Palatnik's family is here, they plan to return periodically for simchas, and to speak.

Working with Aish HaTorah isn't just a job, the Palatniks agree – it is their life.

But mom, why do I have to practise?

By ANNA MORGAN
CJN Staff

TORONTO — Time to practise and the avalanche of excuses begins. Parents are often left wondering – is it really worth the confrontation?

Absolutely, Ruth Levitt said. Her two children, Jane and Simon, are members of the Imperial Quartet, which appeared recently on VR's BreakFast Television.

Jane, 14, on violin and Simon, 16, on cello played with Gideon Weisman, 16, on viola and Kyra Nabeta, 17, on violin. They are all students at the Koffler School of Music at the Bathurst Jewish Centre.

Music has been a great educational experience for my kids, Ruth said. On one level, practising taught them the importance of discipline. They knew that even if they had some talent, it was meaningless without practice.

But their music lessons were also always challenging them. They really couldn't ever coast, Levitt said.

"Children can benefit from music in many different ways," Adrienne Cohen said in an interview.

Cohen is the director of the Koffler School of Music and has studied musical pedagogue for over 20 years.

Cohen points out that there is the Mozart effect, which is based on research that began about 10 years ago at the University of California at Irvine. Over time, evidence began to emerge which indicated certain types of classical music can have a significant positive effect on the intellectual abilities of the brain.

But, there are many other advantages children can take away from their musical education, Cohen said.

"From babies to adolescents to adults, music offers social, therapeutic and educational benefits that last forever," Cohen said.

For example, in a Mom 'n Tot program "when the mother and baby are listening to music, doing musical exercises and just feeling good about each other," Cohen said, "it can be a wonderful bonding time.

"The establishment of this type of mutually enjoyable interaction enables mothers and babies to learn how to read each other's cues and is the basis for the establishment of future relationships," said Keren Epstein-Gilboa, a researcher in developmental psychology.

When kids are ready, they move into more independent programs, Cohen said. At Koffler, the kids can study guitar, piano, violin, cello or flute.

"The children develop one-on-one relationships with their teachers and this type of teaching benefits all children – those that are doing well in school, as well as those that aren't doing well."

Often, she said, the kids will develop long-term relationships with the teachers, who become reference points in their lives.

"When the teachers' relationship with the child is genuine, caring and consistent, it can positively influence the quality of the learning experience," Epstein-Gilboa said.

When they are rehearsing, it's wonderful to see children from all streams of the Jewish community working together, Cohen said.

"Orthodox, Conservative, Reform – everyone is comfortable with each other when they're making music."

Cohen added that the kids are also in tune with diverse groups. This past year, for instance, the Koffler School of Music's Renanim Children's Choir performed with the Columbus Centre and the Italian Cultural Institute.

In this way, the kids feel recognized and discover that music can provide a link between communities in the city, Cohen said.

As the kids get older, there are adult bands they can join, or seniors' musical appreciation groups.

Recently, the kids and their parents were treated to a performance by the Koffler adult band. Cohen said it was wonderful to see music unite three generations.

York U's JSF to be refurbished under Jewish Toronto Tomorrow

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Change is in the air, not only at the University of Toronto's Jewish Students' Union (JSU) – which will have a new home downtown once the Wolfond Centre for Jewish Campus Life is built – but also, on a more modest scale, at York University, where the space occupied by the Jewish Student Federation (JSF) no longer meets the organization's needs.

"We're working on finding potential funders," said Zac Kaye, executive director of Jewish Campus Services (JCS) of Greater Toronto, the local umbrella for Jewish campus organizations.

'We're working on finding potential funders'

Kaye and Pearl Gropper Berman, JCS assistant executive director and former JSF director, have met with Susan Friedrich, architect for the Wolfond Centre, regarding plans for refurbishing JSF's home in York University's Student Centre.

Preliminary plans have been drawn up, but it is too early to say how much the renovation would cost or how long it would take, said Friedrich. Pending funding, the project will go ahead, said Kaye.

Both the JSF refurbishment and the building of the Wolfond Centre at the corner of Huron Street and Harbord Avenue fall under the aegis of Jewish Toronto Tomorrow (JTT), the project launched in April by UJA FEDERATION of Greater Toronto to meet the projected needs of the community for the next ten years.

JTT is working on an $8 million partnership to cover the cost of both projects as well as campus programming, said Kaye. Part of the money has already been raised.

At York, the JSF has occupied its current space for nine years. Prior to that the group operated out of a cramped portable.

In recent years, the JSF has evolved, said Gropper Berman, who served as its director from 1995 to 1999.

"Our work is essentially engagement work," said Kaye. "The [JSF] space should be a tool for us going out on campus."

Although the JSF occupies a large space, at approximately 1,700 square feet, it would benefit from being reconfigured, Gropper Berman said. It is also run-down because it's been so well used, she added.

Currently it is used more for interest-geared and goal-oriented programming than than in past years, she said.

But "the perception is, it's not a very warm or welcoming environment," said Trish Garten, who succeeded Gropper Berman as JSF director last year. (She was out of town when the meeting with Friedrich took place.)

Because staff offices are tucked away at one end of the space, Garten said, "you have to go to the far left to find someone who works there."

"As it stands now, when you walk in you see the chapel wall," Gropper Berman said.

To make the area more welcoming, plans would eliminate the chapel, which hasn't been used for services in at least five years, and would make room at the entrance for someone to greet incoming students.

"We're [also] trying to create some more meeting spaces for the students, so it becomes an area they can operate from, and to make a lounge that's a bit more central," said Friedrich, whose own alma mater is the University of Waterloo, where she graduated in 1983.

Her professional experience on campus includes a library renovation at U of T's Scarborough College.

She uses a collaborative approach, she said. "We work really closely with our clients."

Building Our Community Together
1999/2000
Annual Report
UJA FEDERATION
No one gift changes more lives.

Annual Report

Tzedakah in a new millennium

Last year's Campaign 2000 continued a series of UJA FEDERATION annual campaign success stories, raising more than $41 million — a record amount — during the second year of the Campaign for Fifty. Our objective by the end of 2001 is $50 million annually — with $45 million coming from annual campaign fundraising and $5 million from endowments — to assist the vulnerable, rescue Jews from unstable regions and strengthen Jewish identity.

"We were successful for two reasons," says David Engel, who chaired Campaign 2000 with Mel Wolfond. "First, we pinpointed the needs of the community and explained why additional funds were required. Second, the volunteers had great enthusiasm and took the time to speak with people about the ways in which their donation makes a difference."

Now Campaign 2001 — The Campaign for Our Children, is about to get underway. The Campaign for Our Children intends to raise four million additional dollars for the needs of young people, in order to keep up with the spectacular growth of our community in which two-thirds of Canadian Jewish youth live.

Increased contributions will be directed to three funding initiatives:

➤ NURTURING YOUNG JEWISH SOULS through formal education and Jewish experiences such as youth groups, summer camps, the March of the Living and Birthright Israel.

➤ ASSISTING YOUTH IN DISTRESS who are living in poverty, exposed to abuse or having difficulty integrating into the community after immigrating to Canada.

➤ THE RESCUE OF JEWS from unstable regions of the world, to help them start new lives in Israel.

Campaign 2001 — The Campaign for Our Children, officially begins with the Community Launch on August 30.

UJA FEDERATION programs touch every community member

Nearly every member of our community benefits from services and programs provided by UJA FEDERATION and its partner organizations. Among them are:

March of the Living

A record 400 Canadians, including more than 100 Torontonians, participated in the 7th International March of the Living. Six thousand Jewish teenagers from around the world experienced an emotional pilgrimage to concentration camps and Israel. The 14-day trek featured speeches at Birkenau by the presidents of Israel and Poland, which were broadcast worldwide.

Jewish Family Education

UJA FEDERATION'S Board of Jewish Education, in partnership with synagogues and Jewish schools, have been providing innovative family education programs. Through classes and workshops, students and their parents are learning about Judaism. Together, they share rituals, celebrate holidays, discover customs, and discuss the meaning of tzedakah.

Special Education

UJA FEDERATION's Board of Jewish Education (BJE) has been busy gathering data over the last year about growing requirements for Jewish children with special needs. The data will be used for recommendations on how to strengthen the current range of services and how to deliver them.

Birthright Israel

Nearly 1,000 young people from across Canada experienced Israel — many for the first time — through this pioneering program, administered by two UJA FEDERATION beneficiary agencies, Jewish Campus Services and the Canada Israel Experience Centre. Funding for the first phase of this $300 million initiative, came from Canadian Charles Bronfman, American Michael Steinhardt and others. However, NorthAmerican Jewish federations and the government of Israel will soon join the funding effort so that thousands of North American Jews between the ages of 18 and 26 will have an opportunity to visit Israel. The 10-day tour of, among other sites, the Old City of Jerusalem, Masada, the Dead Sea and the Golan Heights was complemented by educational programs before, during and after the journey.

A Thousand Years of Yiddish

This year-long celebration of Yiddish language, literature and culture, which began last October, continues until November 2000. Free concerts, lectures, exhibits and theatrical presentations, as well as Yiddish classes provide unique opportunities to enjoy the renewal of this proud language as it enters its second millennium.

Holocaust Education Week

The 19th annual Holocaust Education Week, the largest program of its kind in North America, offered more events and venues than ever before. Over 100 programs hosted by dozens of community organizations – including 36 churches — brought the lessons of the Holocaust to life. The week's highlights included addresses by retired Canadian Major-General Lewis Mackenzie, and Madame Justice Louise Arbour, retired Chief Prosecutor of the United Nations International Criminal Tribunal for the former Yugoslavia.

JTT: New partnerships for a thriving future

Jewish Toronto Tomorrow (JTT), our Jewish community's most ambitious initiative is underway. JTT was inaugurated April 16 at the historic Kiever Synagogue, symbolizing the way in which JTT is a bridge between the present and the future. It is the largest infrastructure development program in our community's history, ensuring refurbished facilities in addition to critical programs and services for Toronto's rapidly growing Jewish community for generations to come. Jewish Toronto Tomorrow includes these key components.

➤ COORDINATED CAPITAL CAMPAIGNS. JTT will work with donors and partner organizations to revitalize our communal infrastructure through three campuses for Jewish life: downtown, midtown, and in York Region.

➤ THE DOWNTOWN CAMPUS will include the new Miles Nadal Jewish Community Centre — a renovated and expanded Bloor JCC, and a new Wolfond Centre for Jewish Campus Life. In the central Bathurst-Sheppard corridor, JTT plans will encompass improvements to the Bathurst Jewish Centre and the Lipa Green Building complex as well as the completion of renovations at CHAT — the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto. JTT plans for York Region are highlighted by a new multi-faceted community campus on a recently purchased 50-acre tract of land at Bathurst and Weldrick.

➤ THE ANNUAL CAMPAIGN. As the lifeblood of our community institutions, the annual campaign ensures the healthy preservation of our essential services. Annual Campaign contributions provide funding for Jewish education, dozens of agencies and programs, such as financial assistance for the poor; counseling for abused women and children exposed to violence; youth workers for teens at risk; and, the rescue of Jews from unstable regions.

➤ PLANNED GIVING. Endowments, bequests and other avenues of planned giving generate new and assured sources of income to meet the needs of succeeding generations.

➤ NEW PARTNERSHIPS. JTT will match philanthropists who have specific interests to organizations with innovative ideas about solving urgent challenges. In this way, we will be tapping into new pools of capital and knowledge to make dreams come true.

"JTT will complement the existing model of funding through which agencies and schools receive annual allocations from UJA FEDERATION," says Leslie Gales, Co-Chair of Jewish Toronto Tomorrow with Barry Sherman. "Jewish Toronto Tomorrow is a new approach to philanthropy to meet new community needs. The interests of our contributors will be matched with innovative ideas to deal with the challenges of dramatic community growth in a new century."

The Challenge of Growth

Q&A with Alan Sandler

As UJA FEDERATION President Alan Sandler begins his second year in office, his focus is on Jewish Toronto Tomorrow and its positive impact on the community. In this interview, he shares his thoughts on the achievements of the last year – and the goals for the next.

Q What are some of the most notable achievements of the last year?

Jewish Toronto Tomorrow is the most significant initiative that we have undertaken. By bringing philanthropists, agencies and schools together, we can re-examine community priorities and develop innovative ways to meet community needs.

This year, our community quickly responded to the tragic death of Matti Baranovsky. Working with a newly formed group of 45 women originally from Russia, schools and neighbourhood agencies, UJA FEDERATION, developed and implemented programs specifically for Russian youth.

In York Region, the Family Resource Centre at the Promenade is offering services and programs for increasingly large numbers of participants.

Q What are some of the most important issues facing the Jewish community?

Among our biggest challenges is responding to our community's enormous growth and its movement north, while, at the same time, serving Jews downtown. Our Jewish community has grown from a population of 120,000 to nearly 200,000 in 20 years. So we need to build and renew our physical infrastructure. We also have to think about what we do and how we serve the community. New services and expanded programs are required for both young and old, in addition to professionals — including educators — who will deliver them.

Q Overall, how would you describe the first year of your term?

It has been a wonderful year. We increased funding to a number of critical programs and services. A newly renovated CHAT opened its doors to record enrolment and Birthright Israel was launched. We have much to be grateful for.

Q What's on the agenda for the coming year?

After launching Jewish Toronto Tomorrow, it has to be fully implemented. Planning for our exciting York Region campus at Bathurst & Weldrick will move ahead as we determine preliminary land use priorities. But we also need to reach our $45 million goal for Campaign 2001 — The Campaign for Our Children.

Our agenda is, undoubtedly challenging, but extremely promising for our community's future.

Calgary-born author gets top book award honours

Rosenfarb, who recently moved from Montreal to Toronto, read a passage from Bociany ("Storks"), one of two novels by her to be published recently in English translation by the University of Syracuse Press. (Of Love and Lodz is the other.)

As in previous years, Holocaust themes were much in evidence among the award-winners. The prize for Holocaust Memoir was bestowed posthumously to Arthur Schaller for A 100 Cigarettes and a Bottle of Vodka (published by Malcolm Lester Books).

Toronto Yiddish poet Simcha Simchovitch won a prize for Yiddish translation for The Remnant, his book of translated poems about his experiences as a survivor (Mosaic Press), while the prize in Holocaust History went to Naomi Kramer and Ronald Headland for the scholarly study, The Fallacy of Race and the Shoah (University of Ottawa Press).

Children's author Kathy Kacer won the Young Adult Fiction prize for Gabi's Dresser (Second Story Press), which describes how her grandmother was saved during the Holocaust by hiding in a dresser. Second Story Press editors Sara Silberstein Swartz and Margie Wolfe won the Louis L. Lockshin Memorial Prize for their anthology From Memory to Transformation: Jewish Women's Voices.

Bruce Muirhead's Against The Odds: The Public Life and Times of Louis Rasminsky (University of Toronto Press) took the Canadian Jewish History prize, while poets Seymour Mayne, B. Glen Rotchin and Malca Janice Litovitz shared the prize for Poetry and Poetic Anthologies.

Two works of Biblical scholarship were also honoured: Adele Reinhartz's Why Ask My Name?: Anonymity and Identity in Biblical Narrative (Oxford U. Press), and Rabbi Shlomo Zalman Elazer Grafstein's Judaism's Bible: A New and Expanded Translation (Spirit of the Desert Productions).

"I appreciate this kind of event very much," poet Malca Litovitz told The CJN during the reception. "The concern for Jewish literature demonstrated here, and tonight's magic is exciting to see because it shows that we're all part of a strong community. I feel very blessed to be a part of this community and to have my work acknowledged in this way."

Her book of poetry is titled, To Light, To Water (Ligus Publications).

"It's a marvelous event," said award-winner Adele Reinhartz. "There's a wonderful sense of celebration of Canada and the cultural richness of the Canadian Jewish community."

"The awards reflect a kind of ecumenical approach to Jewish literature and Jewish history," said publisher Malcolm Lester. "As Rabbi Grafstein noted in his acceptance comments, there are a lot of divisions in the Jewish community, but this event brings a sort of unity to the community."

The total cash value of the evening's awards amounted to about $7,000, Fuerstenberg said.

Ottawa volunteers honoured at JCC meeting

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — Community volunteer awards were presented recently at the 66th annual general meeting of the Jewish Community Council of Ottawa/Vaad Ha'Ir.

The Freiman Family Young Leadership Award, which recognizes a member of the Jewish community under the age of 40, was presented to Leiba Krantzberg, 32.

Currently co-president of the Hillel Academy PTA and co-chair of the Hillel Academy lottery, Krantzberg is also a member of the executive committee of the Ottawa Talmud Torah Board; an executive member of the board of Congregation Machzikei Hadas; and a member of Women's Division, State of Israel Bonds.

After receiving the award from A. J. Freiman, on behalf of the Freiman family, Krantzberg said, "I take this opportunity to address my peers in this community and to encourage them to become actively involved."

The community's highest award, the Gilbert Greenberg Distinguished Service Award, for exceptional service over the course of many years, was presented posthumously to Lorry Greenberg and his nephew, Lawrence Greenberg.

Former recipient Stephen Victor spoke of the two men, and their deaths within a few months of each other. "Lorry and Lawrence shared their love for family, community and all things Jewish, and they both knew that the best gift they could bestow on their family and community was the gift of example, the example of leadership."

Vaad President Stephen Greenberg said,"...much of what I know and understand about community involvement, I learned from cousins Lawrence and Lorry," he said.

Stephen Greenberg also expressed the community's appreciation to members of the Embassy of Israel, including Ambassador David Sultan and his wife Adina, who will be returning to Israel in July.

In presenting a farewell gift to Ambassador Sultan, Greenberg said, "I know I speak for all Canadian Jewry when I say you will be missed, but the Ottawa community feels it even more personally."

Community service recognized

WINNIPEG — In a life devoted to public service, one of Winnipeg businessman Sheldon Berney's crowning achievements was his leadership in building the Asper Jewish Community Campus.

In recognition of that accomplishment, Berney has been chosen by the Jewish Federation of Winnipeg/CJA to receive its Sol Kanee Distinguished Community Service Medal.

The award was one of several presented at the community's annual Koved Evening, held recently at Shaarey Zedek Synagogue.

The Sol Kanee Medal is named after the self-effacing Winnipegger who has been described as one of the most important international Jewish leaders of the past 50 years.

Berney, who a few years ago sold the family plastics business he headed, currently chairs the Jewish Foundation of Manitoba's investment committee. He also serves on the board of the Manitoba Opera, the Associates of the Faculty of Administrative Studies and other community organizations. Last year, he served on the Combined Jewish Appeal's management team and co-chaired the Top Donors Division.

Berney first became involved with the Campus project in 1989. Over six years of designing, planning and fund-raising, he recruited a strong team of volunteers who moved the plan forward.

The federation's second major award, the Max and Mollie Shore Memorial Award, was given to volunteers and fund-raisers Sondra Cohn and Brownie Fleishman. The two honourees have been involved in a wide range of community endevours, from CJA campaigns to the Shaarey Zedek Synagogue, the YMHA, Jewish Child & Family Service and the Winnipeg Jewish Community Council.

They are perhaps best known for their leadership in Hadassah-WIZO and the Jewish National Fund, for which they have chaired numerous fund-raising events over the past 30 years.

Other Shem Tov Award winners this year include include Allan Fineblit, immediate past president of the Rose and Max Rady Jewish Community Centre; Leona Billinkoff, for many years the head of Camp Massad; Jeff Frank, co-chair of the capital committee for B'nai Brith Jewish Community Camp; Madam Justice Freda Steel, a past president of the Winnipeg Board of Jewish Education; Dr. Isadore Wolch, a founder of the Jewish Genealogical Institute; Leslie Wilder, a vice-president of JIAS Canada and national board member of the AJFCA, for her decade of service to Winnipeg's Jewish Child & Family Service; Gerry Kalef who has been a CJA canvasser for many years; Shawnee Greenberg, long time board member of the Aleph-Bet Child Life Enrichment Program; and Sophie Shinewald, board member of the Gwen Secter Creative Living Centre, member of the Committee on Aging and fund-raiser for several Jewish causes.

Israeli Scouts Friendship Caravan set to perform

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — The Israeli Scouts Friendship Caravan will soon be making its annual North American tour.

The group of 16 and 17-year olds, all active in the Israeli scouting movement, spend the summer touring the cities, towns and summer camps of North America, sponsored by various groups and organizations.

The teens are talented singers and dancers, possess leadership and communication skills, have a good command of English, and have attained a high level of proficiency in the scouting movement.

Howard Osterer, Canadian tour representative for the Jewish Advisory Committee on Scouting and Guiding, is co-ordinating the Canadian tour this year, following the recent death of Robert Engel, chair of the advisory committee, who was responsible for bringing the troupe to Canada.

"This is a wonderful opportunity for our community to meet and greet these fine young ambassadors of Israel," said Osterer. "Their excitement and enthusiasm is contagious, and our community looks forward to their visit every year."

There will be two performances in Ottawa. The first, on Tuesday, June 27 at 7:30 p.m., will be sponsored by the Vered Israel cultural program of the Soloway Jewish Community Centre and will take place at the centre. It will be followed by a teen dance with a disc jockey.

The following day, the Israeli Scouts will provide the opening entertainment for Youth Forum 2000, a meeting of scouts from across Canada.

The 2000 Israeli Scout Friendship Caravan is set to tour North America.

While in Ottawa, the scouts will be hosted by local families.

The 10 teens will put on a one-hour show consisting of Hebrew songs and dances; throughout the show, audience participation is encouraged.

The Caravan will be in Montreal on June 26, and Toronto on June 29.

Complaint lodged over casino letter

MONTREAL — The widow of a Holocaust survivor has lodged a complaint with the League for Human Rights of B'nai Brith Canada, after receiving a letter from the Montreal Casino addressed to "Mr. Adolf Hitler."

The letter appears with the signature of casino general manager Jacques H.Grilli and welcomes "Dear Mr. Hitler" as a member of the Casino Privilèges Club, a promotion that gives card-holders benefits, like chances to win jackpots and a subscription to the casino newsletter.

Casino officials sent an apology to the woman and are conducting an investigation.

Getting such a letter was deeply offensive and shocking to the woman, whose husband lost his entire family in the Holocaust and who had two brothers who fought in World War II, said Steven Slimovitch, chair of the League's legal committee, Quebec region.

He and the League's Quebec region chair, Allan Adel, wrote a letter to Grilli asking for "an explanation as to the circumstances surrounding this letter.

"We hope this issue will be investigated expeditiously, and that appropriate disciplinary measures be taken to ensure this type of incident will not be repeated," they wrote.

Where is input into social policy?

Scene in Ottawa

By G.K. SIMCOE

Increasingly, the Senate has become the kind of chamber of "sober second thought" envisioned by the Fathers of Confederation. It now serves as the thought-provoking barometer of social policy in Canada.

It is, therefore, no great surprise that the upper chamber issued a most important report dealing with the issue of a national strategy to deal with end-of-life care. Sharon Carstairs, the former Liberal leader of Manitoba chaired the sub-committee that looked at the question of palliative care and the growing pressures on families confronted with the pain of a loved one approaching the end of life.

As Canadian society ages, this whole area has become an urgent concern. One of the subjects the report discusses is the so-called "eternity leave" and what financial resources should be made available to familial caregivers of the aged and infirm.

This question ought to be of special importance to the Jewish community, which has a statistically high proportion of seniors within its ranks. It is, therefore, unfortunate that there was no visible representation from the Jewish community when the Senate committee studied the matter.

This, in turn, raises an important question about the role of national Jewish organizations in the development of Canadian public policy. There was a time when Canadian Jewish Congress, for example, played a prominent role in the public policy process through its Law and Social Action Committee. In recent years, however, both B'nai Brith and CJC have become more parochial in their interaction with federal and even provincial governments.

To be sure, there is no shortage of issues like school funding that should feature prominently on the communal agenda.

That having been said, two things should serve as obvious motivating factors to ensure a Jewish presence on the larger social issues. First, every social policy issue, in some way, directly affects the Jewish community. The above-mentioned example speaks for itself. Second, one would think that Jewish values and traditions have important things to say about all of these social issues. Withholding that perspective from the larger debate denies the wider society the benefit of the Jewish perspective.

That would be unfortunate – both for the Jewish community and Canadian society in general. It would also be a lost opportunity to build bridges with other stakeholders, and that too would be truly unfortunate.

Saint John Museum opens for 15th season

By JOEL JACOBSON
Atlantic Correspondent

SAINT JOHN, N.B. — A year ago, the Saint John Jewish Historical Museum was almost on the verge of closing after 13 successful years.

But with the recent official opening of its 15th season, the museum is on a solid financial footing. New exhibits are ready and officials are sure last year's total of 4,000 visitors will be surpassed.

"We needed to raise money quickly a year ago to get our 14th season under way," said museum president Lloyd Goldsmith. "We did it and are healthy for now but, like most non-profits, will always be faced with the need to raise money."

He suggested that an annual campaign for operating expenses will be necessary so the museum doesn't eat up what it has. "We can't do a lot corporately in a small community like Saint John. We are seeking help from national foundations but realize they fund specific projects, not operating expenses."

Curator Katherine Biggs-Craft is excited about new displays and strong, ongoing ones. "Our permanent exhibit, a collection of religious artifacts, our chapel, mikvah and Hebrew school classroom, is always there. We have an archives and library which attracts historians and genealogists.

"But this year, we have an exhibit of Jewish immigration to Saint John, a collection of photos of immigrant families, how they travelled, pictures of Partridge Island in Saint John harbour where they landed, and treasures they brought with them, such as a Russian samovar, greenglass pitcher and glasses from Poland, religious books from Europe, all treasures loaned or donated by members of our community."

She said there is a selection of 20 early-20th century postcards from New York City depicting traditional Jewish life as well as an art show on a Jewish theme, loaned by members of the Saint John community.

"It's exciting that we have 80 cruise ships coming to our port this summer," said Biggs-Craft. "We have started a Jewish bus tour, meeting travellers at the port, and guiding them through the city's north end where the community used to be, through the museum and synagogue and to the cemetery."

Obituaries

Winnipeg activist helped found Jewish museum

BY MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — With the passing of Marion Vickar on May 23, the Jewish world has lost a woman renowned for her generosity and community involvement.

"My mother was a humble, self-effacing person," says her daughter, Elaine Sharfe of Saskatoon. "I was surprised at how much people thought of her and the number of people who called to tell me about her kindnesses."

Marion Vickar was born in Hoffer, Saskatchewan, 85 years ago. Her parents, Israel and Clara Hoffer (the town was named after her family), were early pioneers and founders of one of the Jewish farm colonies in southern Saskatchewan.

Marion Hoffer was a teacher in Saskatchewan before marrying Ed Vickar. The newlyweds operated a general store in rural Saskatchewan for a time. Later, Ed acquired his first car dealership in Melfort, Saskatchewan.

In Melfort, Marion was involved in a host of Jewish and general community organizations. She was particularly active with the Canadian Mental Health Association, helping to establish programs for those with mental illness or special needs. Sharfe notes Marion was a member of the jury that established the precedent in Saskatchewan of not guilty by reason of insanity.

Ed and Marion Vickar moved to Winnipeg in 1963 when Ed bought Community Chevrolet here. Marion Vickar continued her community work. She was president of her Hadassah chapter, chair of the Women's Division of the CJA and chair of The Inner Circle, the Rotary Club's largest service branch.

Together, Ed and Marion generously contributed to a wide range of Israel-based organizations including the JNF, State of Israel Bonds, the Canadian Zionist Federation, and Israel's major universities. They also endowed the Hoffer-Vickar Chair of Orthomolecular Studies, Department of Psychiatry at Ben-Gurion University and built a visitor's centre at the university campus in Sde Boker.

In Winnipeg, their most lasting contribution is the Marion and Ed Vickar Jewish Museum of Western Canada, at the Asper Jewish Community Campus.

"My mother was truly my father's silent partner," says Sharfe.

"He wouldn't have succeeded in all he did without her."

Sharfe notes that while her mother was not a shul-goer, keeping a Jewish home was important to her. She also recalls that her mother's interests included painting, collecting and reading.

"She was a voracious reader, always eager to learn," Sharfe says.

Marion Vickar had been ill for the past two years suffering from congestive heart failure. In addition to her husband and daughter, she is survived by her son, Gary Vickar in St. Louis, seven grandchildren, nine great-grandchildren and a brother, Dr. Abram Hoffer in Victoria.

Developer supported Baycrest

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Ben Katz, a man known for his interest in the welfare of the Jewish elderly, died recently. He was 94.

The Baycrest Hospital, where he died, bears his name and that of his wife, Hilda, who is 90.

Ben and Hilda Katz remain the single largest donors to Baycrest. Their donations of more than $10 million have included contributions to the Rotman Research Institute, as well as to gerontological nursing and social work.

Their charitable foundation has also contributed to more than 40 social and cultural groups.

Katz was a member of the United Jewish Peoples Order.

Though he did not finish high school, Katz became a wealthy developer, investing in building houses and apartment buildings in Brampton.

By the age of nine, his entrepreneurial ability began to emerge when he earned money rolling cigarettes for German troops stationed near the Polish town where he was born.

In 1924, Katz, who was one of four children, came to Canada at age 18 and worked to pay for passage to Canada for his two sisters. After the war, he sponsored three first cousins who survived the Holocaust.

During the war, he lived in Chesley, near Owen Sound, operating a dress shop, but returned to Toronto after the war.

His mother-in-law, Rose Shanfield, was a resident of the Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care in the 1960s. At the time, Katz commented that "we could make life better for the elderly." This led to the creation of the 300-bed Baycrest Hospital.

"He recognized the needs of others," said Malca Sufrin, a niece, and former high school teacher, who added that he insisted on paying her university expenses.

PRIME study focuses on treatment of schizophrenia

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Researchers at Toronto's Centre for Addiction and Mental Health are taking part in a study to see if early intervention can prevent the onset or reduce the serious effects of schizophrenia.

Other institutions in this PRIME study include Yale University, University of Calgary and the University of North Carolina.

Dr. Robert Zipursky, clinical director of the schizophrenia and continuing care program at the centre and associate professor of psychiatry at the University of Toronto, and Dr. Irvin Epstein, director of the PRIME Clinic and assistant professor at the University of Toronto, talked to The CJN about the disease and the study.

The PRIME study, which began in fall 1999 (people can join until December of this year), is a random study to prove whether early intervention with medication will help those with very early symptoms and those with a family history of the disease.

Epstein noted that "in Australia, preliminary evidence is that without medication, 40 percent of such people will go on to have a psychotic episode."

Dr. Irvin Epstein

The study begins with assessments of both the person and the family.

It is very important to have the family involvement, the two doctors stressed, to help the patient through the very difficult process of learning to deal with the situation.

The goal of the current study, and of a program under way at the Centre for Addiction and Mental Health called First Episode, is to prevent all hospitalizations, not only "to reduce hospital costs," said Zipursky somewhat tongue-in-cheek, but to return people to their homes and to normal lives.

Contrary to popular myth, schizophrenia has nothing to do with split personalities or multiple personalities, and people with the disease are not necessarily violent, severely disabled or homeless, Zipursky stressed.

"Schizophrenia is a splitting of the mind between emotion and thought," he explained. "It is a brain disorder, a biological illness that leads to a dysfunction in reality testing."

The disease, which affects about one percent of the population across all ethnic and racial boundaries, typically begins during the period between adolescence and young adulthood – between 18 and 25 in men, and from 22 to 29 in women, although it may appear as early as 12.

The difference may have something to do with the higher level of estrogen in women, or because men are more likely to "act out" behaviourally, while women internalize.

Early symptoms, which may occur some five years before the person loses touch with reality, include distancing from friends, family, usual interests, or jobs; emotional distancing; lack of motivation and focus; depression; and anxiety.

While some of these symptoms mimic typical adolescent angst, Zipursky said it is the difference between someone saying, "I feel depressed," as opposed to someone not realizing the decline in their personality.

In a full-blown schizophrenic episode, there may be hallucinations, severe paranoia, bizarre delusions (thinking that they are Napoleon or God, for instance), disorganized language and disturbed behaviour.

Dr. Robert Zipursky

There may be some genetic connection, Zipursky said, adding that one out of five people with schizophrenia has a clear family history of the disease.

Epstein added that "in previous years it may have gone unrecognized, or been hidden, especially in environments where arranged marriages are common."

It used to be believed that hospitalization was the best treatment for schizophrenia. Now, new drugs, especially those with few side effects, such as risperidone (Risperdal), olanzapine (Zyprexa) and clozapine, often help.

This seems to be particularly true if the drugs are prescribed early.

While 80 percent of people with a first episode of schizophrenia have a full recovery after one year on these medications, Zipursky said, it is also true that "80 per cent [of them] will have a second episode, probably almost entirely due to not taking their medications."

Medications with few, if any, side effects may lessen the tendency to quit taking them, as will education and a strong system of support.

An incidence of one percent may seem very low; however, in the Toronto Jewish community, for instance, it means that nearly 2,000 people have this devastating disease, which can (and in the past did) lead to permanent disability.

Zipursky and Epstein pointed out that much of the research into early treatment has been done in places with well-developed national health care systems, such as Canada, Israel, Australia and Europe.

Baycrest named Employer of the Year

TORONTO — The Registered Nurses Association of Ontario has named Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care Employer of the Year.

The award recognizes a health care organization that promotes excellence in clinical care as well as a commitment to professional nursing practice, research and professional development.

"RNAO is proud to sponsor this award. It is vital that employers like Baycrest, who are highly committed to excellence in nursing practice and who create environments conductive to its achievement, be publicly acknowledged," says Shirlee Sharkey, RNAO president.

"Outstanding employers make a substantive difference in the lives of patients and the lives of nurses," she said.

"By cultivating an environment of life-long learning, Baycrest has inspired nurses to continually set new goals for themselves, and push for innovations in geriatric care to enrich the lives of our elderly."

UN confirms Israel's withdrawal from Lebanon

By NAOMI SEGAL
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — After much debate on Sunday, the United Nations Security Council endorsed the finding that Israel is now in full compliance with a 1978 Security Council resolution.

Lebanon's rejection of the U.N. conclusion that Israeli forces had completely withdrawn from Lebanon initially prompted the Security Council to delay endorsing Secretary-General Kofi Annan's finding that Israel is now in full compliance with the 1978 resolution.

The council – in a nod to Russia, which presented the Lebanese view during the Security Council's deliberations – also acknowledged that there may have been some violations of the border since last Friday, when Annan confirmed that Israel had withdrawn to the international border.

Earlier in the day, Russia's attempts to block the council from issuing the endorsement angered other diplomats, who accused Russia of working with Syria, the main power broker in Lebanon.

The Security Council did not need Lebanon's agreement, but without it, the United Nations would not have acted on plans to station peacekeepers in the region which Israel evacuated last month.

Israel considers the presence of such peacekeepers, along with the Lebanese military, crucial to bringing security to the area, which is now under the control of Hezbollah gunmen.

For its part, Hezbollah has threatened to renew attacks against Israel if the Jewish state does not withdraw from territory that Lebanon is claiming.

Annan, who is currently visiting several countries in the Middle East, was slated to visit Lebanon on Monday and discuss the situation with Lebanese leaders.

He downplayed the disagreement, describing it on Sunday as "a hiccup that will be overcome."

Israel welcomed Annan's finding, adding that it expected U.N. peacekeepers and the Lebanese army to take up positions in the area vacated by the Israeli army. Lebanon has dispatched security forces to the area, but has yet to deploy any army troops there.

EU ready to recognize PA state

By AKIVA ELDAR
Ha'aretz Daily News Ltd.

JERUSALEM — The European Union is getting ready to recognize a Palestinian state if one is declared in September, whether by agreement with Israel or unilaterally.

A special committee of EU officials is currently discussing the status of the European consulates in Jerusalem, after the EU recognizes a Palestinian state with East Jerusalem as its capital.

In the Berlin Declaration of March 1999, the EU expressed support for the setting up of a Palestinian state and called on both sides to conclude the negotiations within a year.

In return for Yasser Arafat's willingness to postpone the declaration, set for May 1999, most of the EU countries promised to recognize a Palestinian state if Israel and the PA failed to reach agreement by the end of 2000.

The United States officially denied that the Berlin Declaration had been co-ordinated with it, but American sources have said the declaration was preceded by a favourable nod from Washington to Brussels.

Israel's Foreign Ministry fears that France's assumption of the rotating EU presidency at the beginning of next month will further promote Palestinian efforts to invoke the Berlin Declaration. It did not escape Israeli attention that President Jacques Chirac was the only Western leader to attend Syrian President Hafez Assad's recent funeral.

Oil hike could bring Iran nukes

By ALUF BENN
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Senior Israeli analysts warn that the sharp rise in international oil prices in the last few months will allow Iran to intensify its nuclear weapons and long-range ballistic missiles programs.

In addition, these additional revenues will enable Iran to provide extensive support to radical Islamic groups outside its borders.

In reports by military intelligence and the Foreign Ministry – recently presented to senior government officials – a past correlation between oil prices and Iran's ability "to export Islamic revolution" was shown.

Analysts say the effort to build nuclear weapons, a priority for the Iranian regime, has a guaranteed budget which never shrinks, even when the national economy hits low points.

But these experts believe the increase in revenues from oil exports will expedite Iran's efforts to arm itself with non-conventional weapons.

Experts say the rise in oil consumption internationally stems from growing economies and seasonal needs – mainly in east Asia, where a recovery is apparent after last year's economic slump.

Four Iranian Jews retract 'confessions'

By JULIE WIENER
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

NEW YORK — Four of the 13 Iranian Jews accused of spying for Israel retracted their "confessions" in court last week, according to an American advocate.

Malcolm Hoenlein, executive vice-chair of the Conference of Presidents of Major American Jewish organizations, said Shahrokh Paknahad, Farzad Kashi, Nasser Levi Haim and Farhad Saleh told Judge Sadeq Nourani that their "confessions" had been made under duress.

A Muslim accused of collaborating with the Jews also denied the charge.

"We should not be overly optimistic about these reports, but these are certainly positive developments," said Hoenlein, whose organization has long contended that all 13 Jews are innocent and has been active in advocating on their behalf.

Reuters quoted the Jews' attorney, Esmail Nasseri, as saying that the court proceedings "were of benefit to our clients and strengthen the defence team's assertions that our clients are not guilty."

Pooya Dayanim, a spokesperson for the Council of Iranian American Jewish Organizations in Los Angeles, said the Jewish community in Shiraz is "becoming more confident every day. Our hope is that the other people who allegedly confessed can be brought to court so they can recant their confessions as well," he said.

When nine of the Jews "confessed" last month, observers insisted that they were coerced after having spent 15 months in solitary confinement, with human contact limited mostly to interrogators.

The Jews were arrested more than a year ago and three were released on bail in February.

The trial was closed to the public and the judge also assumed the role of investigator, prosecutor and jury. That would be considered a clear conflict of interest under Western law.

A verdict was expected at the end of this week.

Mandela warns not to condemn Iran

By SUZANNE BELLING
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JOHANNESBURG, S.A. — Former President Nelson Mandela is defending his recent statements that 13 Iranian Jews are getting a fair hearing in their espionage trial.

"I am doing everything to save the lives of those people," Mandela said last week at a gathering celebrating a new book written by South Africa's Chief Rabbi Cyril Harris – For Heaven's Sake: The Chief Rabbi's Diary.

Mandela said he warned U.S. Jewish leaders in New York last month that "by condemning the trial, you are endangering the lives of those 13" who are accused by Iran of spying for Israel.

After Mandela called the espionage trial "free and fair" during his U.S. visit last month, the American Jewish Committee cancelled a luncheon in his honour.

Mandela is believed to be the only high-profile figure in the world to have spoken out in favour of Iran's handling of the trial, which began last month.

"What we must consider is how to save those 13 and the best thing to do is not to force the Iranians to say, 'We want to show the United States of America and Israel that we are an independent country – so we are going to pass the death sentence and execute those people,'" Mandela said at last week's event.

Mandela, 82, has enjoyed warm relations with South Africa's Jewish community.

The Week in Israel

June 12

• A delegation of Israeli Arab Knesset members received permission to attend Syrian President Hafez al-Assad's funeral. More than 100 Druze, however, were refused entry into Syria.

June 13

• Israeli and Palestinian officials resumed negotiations toward a final peace deal, at two air force bases near Washington. No details of the talks were provided by the State Department.

June 14

• Prime Minister Ehud Barak said he would press on with the peace process despite a threat by a leading coalition party to quit his government. His comments came as officials from the Shas party said it was unlikely they would back off their plans to resign from the government Sunday.

• The IDF is preparing for another outbreak of Palestinian violence in the territories before a final peace deal is reached. A senior army officer said the Palestinians are more interested in achieving statehood through confrontation than through negotiation.

June 15

• "There is a very wide gap" between the Israeli and Palestinian positions and it is unlikely a final peace accord will be reacted by a September deadline, Foreign Minister David Levy said.

June 16

• The Shas party could lose up to six of its 17 Knesset seats if elections were held soon according to a poll sponsored by Israel Radio. According to a Ma'ariv poll, 55 percent of the public is dissatisfied with the way the prime minister has handled the Shas ultimatum.

Supreme Court head extols human rights

"But the lesson was not hatred, not the hopelessness of human nature. It was the spirit of the human being and the ability to overcome difficulties and to survive."

In a warmly received address, the 64-year-old Barak, under whose direction Israel's Supreme Court has issued a number of often unpopular rulings affirming the rights of Israelis and Arabs alike, said the Holocaust imbued him with a sense of "the centrality of the human being and the importance of human rights."

Judging "is a lost art," said Barak, who assumed the Supreme Court's presidency in 1995 after serving as Israel's attorney general and dean of law at Hebrew University. A judge should have no agenda, he offered.

"I am neutral, but neutrality is not the same as indifference." A judge should "protect and further human rights and the dignity of man...to search and find the appropriate balance between the rights of the individual and the rights of a society."

Barak returned repeatedly to his theme that human rights are paramount; that they need to be applied equally at the same time as the rule of law must prevail.

And it's not just the rule of law "but the rule of democratic law [balancing] the needs of the state and the right of the individual. A democracy is not just majority rule. A majority which violates the rights of the minority does not act in a democratic way."

In introducing Barak, Peter Hogg, dean of the law school, noted many of the Israeli Supreme Court's recent decisions: allowing women to serve on local religious councils; upholding equal rights among same-sex partners; striking down the military's use of administrative detention; and stopping the army's use of torture.

In May, the court issued a landmark decision: allowing women to read from the Torah in organized prayer at the Western Wall and ordering the security apparatus to protect them.

Barak praised Canada as a constitutional role model, saying our Charter of Rights is "an example to the world," and that Canada's Supreme Court "is one of the best in the world."

Israel relied on Canada's charter in revising its own constitutional laws in 1992.

But rights, Barak said, don't come easily or automatically. They "must be protected every week, every day, every hour."

His presence at York was an initial step in the university's plan to establish a visiting professorship in Jewish law and ethics.

Just prior to the convocation ceremony, Barak explained his concept of judging to a select group of lawyers and law professors.

"I do think judges have agendas. Judges are neutral and independent [but] not neutral in personal values. A judge's mission is to build bridges between law and life."

Another is to uphold the constitution, and, of course, human rights.

"His or her agenda is to seek balance. It's a mistake to talk just about human rights. Human beings have rights only within communities. Therefore, the peace and tranquility of the community is a major interest and value which judges should take into account. Communities do not exist for the individual.

"The proper agenda for a judge is to do his or her best to find proper balance between individual and community. A judge should reflect the values of his or her society. He should reflect history and not hysteria."

Last Thursday, Barak addressed a gathering sponsored by the Canadian Friends of Hebrew University.

At York, he earned polite laughter when he noted the many compliments he'd received in Toronto. "At home, I'm not used to hearing nice things."

Israel & the Jewish World

Jurists will address issues 'on the Jewish agenda'

By PAUL LUNGEN & VIVA PRESS
CJN Reporters

Lawyers, judges and academics from around the world will gather in Toronto this summer for a watershed meeting of the International Association of Jewish Lawyers and Jurists (IAJLJ).

For the first time since the IAJLJ was founded in 1969, the human rights organization will hold a conference in North America. As many as 1,000 delegates from 30 countries are expected to attend the meeting, which runs from Aug. 13 to 16 at the Sheraton Centre Hotel. The conference theme this year is, Pursuing Justice in the Global Village.

Canadian and international legal personalities are expected to participate in the conference's plenary and in smaller sessions. Among those scheduled to address the meetings are: Yossi Beilin, Israel's Minister of Justice; Yoram Dinstein, former president of Tel Aviv University; MP Irwin Cotler, professor of law at McGill University; Prof. David Unterhalter, director of the centre for applied legal studies at the University of Witwatersrand, South Africa; Justice Rosalie Abella and John I. Laskin of the Ontario Court of Appeal; and Prof. Amnon Rubinstein, chair of the Knesset Law Committee.

Organizing committee chair Igor Ellyn was excited about the prospect of Toronto hosting the event. This "signifies a desire of the association to bring it to the attention of many more lawyers and jurists in North America who are interested in the association's work," he said.

Besides raising the organization's profile in Canada and the United States, the meeting will serve as a forum to discuss key issues of justice and it will provide Jewish jurists with a means of networking, he said.

The conference will provide Jewish perspectives on human rights, democracy, media and commerce. Plenary sessions will address issues of crimes against humanity, electronic anti-Semitism, and the way in which Jewish and Israeli issues are portrayed in the international media. Smaller sessions will examine such issues as secular justice and religious law, free trade in the global village and the restitution of Holocaust era assets.

Cotler, honorary chair of the conference, said the meeting should strengthen the already firm ties that bind Canada and Israel. The legal relationship is "the crown jewel in the Canada-Israel relationship," he said.

During Prime Minister Chrétien's recent visit to Israel, Israeli Chief Justice Aharon Barak pointed out that Canada's Charter of Rights is the source of inspiration for Israel's basic laws on human rights and that Canadian jurisprudence is cited by Israeli courts more often than the legal decisions of any other country, Cotler said.

Hadessah Ben-Itto

Israeli jurist Hadassah Ben-Itto, who heads the IAJLJ, said Toronto was selected to host the conference because "we have a very impressive committee of lawyers in Canada."

Ben-Itto, who will address the IAJLJ's opening session, has been the president of the association for 12 years. During a legal career that spanned 36 years, she served as justice of the Supreme Court in Israel and vice-president of the Tel Aviv District Court. When she was appointed to the bench in 1960, she was the youngest judge in Israel and only the fifth woman to be named to the bench.

She served on Israel's delegation to the UN in 1965, and again 10 years later in 1975.

Today, she is one of the 17 judges – and the only woman – on the international tribunal in Switzerland that deals with dormant accounts of Holocaust victims.

On October 31, 1991, Ben-Itto officially presided over her last hearing. A few months earlier she shocked Israel's legal community by announcing her early retirement. Her reason: to research and write a book about The Protocols of the Elders of Zion, the Russian secret police forgery that claims a Jewish conspiracy for world domination.

Although officially retired, Ben-Itto, 74, still presides over commercial arbitrations and she serves as president of the IAJLJ and its quarterly magazine, Justice.

"There's nothing in our world that doesn't have some legal aspect," she said in a telephone interview from her home in Tel Aviv. "That's why [law] is so interesting. The law deals with real problems of people. It's very exciting. I loved every day both as a lawyer and on the bench. That's why I'm still involved in it in the association..

"When I started practising law I think I was the only woman in Israel who practised criminal law privately," she said. "We were a generation that paved the way for the women who came after us."

Today more than 50 percent of Israel's judiciary are women, she noted.

Ben-Itto, who has one daughter and two grandchildren, said she always had an interest in the private life of the Jewish people.

"You name it, the IAJLJ deals with all issues on the Jewish agenda. It's a continuation of what I did all of my life," she said.

Jazz singer Julie Michels performs at Le Select Bistro

By KATHRYN KATES
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Cool jazz sounds will waft through the air when American-born, Toronto-based jazz singer Julie Michels, performs at Le Select Bistro on June 25, as part of the du Maurier Downtown Jazz in Toronto.

Michels will be joined on stage by bassist John Greggie and guitarist Kim Ratcliffe, both members of the Ottawa-based band, Chelsea Bridge. The trio mixes old with new, from freshly written originals to standards by some of Michels' favourite composers, like George Gershwin and Cole Porter.

A singer who also plays guitar and percussion and "mucks around" with piano and bass, Michels has no qualms about including tunes from other genres like Lyle Lovett's First Mistake.

Michels has only praise for her band members. "Playing with musicians like this is a privilege that singers don't always get," she says, noting that unlike other bands, hers is a true team effort.

Michels' earlier years were spent travelling the world as a U.S. army brat with her father Mike Saylor, mother, Lou, a former musical theatre performer and two equally musical sisters.

When Michels was 12, her father, who was by then working as a civilian, moved the family to Toronto. "My mother says I used to hum when I nursed. One day she noticed I was humming in tune with the hi-fi," says the singer who has been performing since she was 15.

Her first attempt at formal training was not too successful. "I tried studying opera at one point, but I was told by a coloratura soprano, a woman who can hit notes only dogs can hear, that I have a hormonal imbalance, because normal healthy women couldn't sing the bass clef," Michels explains.

"She suggested I see a specialist. I thought, no, my hormones are just fine thank you. I have a four-octave range in the wrong direction, I sing too low to actively sing opera, so I started singing other stuff."

It wasn't until this political philosophy and economics student at the University of Wisconsin needed a course outside her major that she discovered a knack for jazz.

"There was a course called Black Music History," she says. "I wandered into the class and bassist Richard Davis teaching. He was a legend although I didn't know it at the time. He's played with Sarah Vaughan, Count Bassie and Shirley Horn. Igor Stravinsky wrote a little song for him. Richard changed my life."

Michels stayed in Wisconsin after university for a few years then decided to ply her talents in Europe. She says the experience was incredible but very frightening because she didn't know anyone.

She would go up to musicians and ask to sing. Europeans loved her stylings and Michels spent 2½ years singing on both sides of the Atlantic.

Julie Michels

At the North Sea Jazz Festival in The Hague, Netherlands, Michels was thrilled to be performing at the same venue as the late Betty Carter, a jazz icon who Michels credits as one of her greatest inspirations.

The vocalist resettled in Toronto in 1992. She continues to tour across the country and has garnered many fans from as far away as the Yukon.

Last year Michels was thrilled to be asked to open for Manhattan Transfer at Toronto's Molson Amphitheatre.

Michels has recorded an independent CD with bassist George Koller called Singing Naked and is about to start production on her second effort. When she is not performing, the former chef enjoys cooking, camping, canoeing, reading and is an avid moviegoer.

She hopes the next time she performs in the north, she can spend some time canoeing down the Yukon River.

"What motivates me to sing, at least in part, is very spiritual. For me to be able to sing and make music is a gift. I don't take it for granted – ever, ever, ever!"

For advance reservations for Michels' 7:45 p.m. du Maurier Downtown Jazz concert at Le Select Bistro, 328 Queen St. W., call 416-596-6405.

SIDETRIPS BETWEEN TEL AVIV & JERUSALEM

TRAVEL TALK

BY BILL GLADSTONE

If you've been to Israel, chances are you've travelled on Highway 1, the 64-kilometre expressway between the country's two main cities, Tel Aviv and Jerusalem. The journey from one to the other usually takes about 45 minutes.

The six-lane highway crosses the Plain of Sharon, skirts Ben-Gurion International Airport, then rises through the Valley of Ayalon where, 3,500 years ago, Joshua bade the sun stand still.

If you let time stand still for you for a few hours, there are many things to see in the vicinity.

Just past the midway point between the two cities, the highway enters the steep Shaar Hagai Valley and snakes up to Jerusalem, 840 metres above sea level. Here one looks eagerly, and often with growing anticipation, at the farms, villages, and valleys and hills reforested with pine trees. From this point, Jerusalem is only about 20 minutes away.

By exiting Highway 1 at the Shaar Hagai interchange and driving south along Route 38, travellers arrive at Kibbutz Tzora. Founded in the 1940s, Tzora boasts a thriving boutique winery that produces both red and white vintages. The kibbutz, which dates back to the nation's pioneer heyday, sells vegetables, breads and cheeses. Guided tours of the flower-filled village are available.

About 20 kilometres further is Bet Guvrin and its assortment of fascinating ancient caves, some quite extensive with vast vaults and (in one case) a gloriously painted interior. One is fashioned as a columbarium, with thousands of tiny niches believed to be originally for housing pigeons.

Adjacent to Bet Guvrin is Tel Maresha, a steep mound on the site of a substantial metropolis dating back 2,500 years. Excavations have revealed remains of Israelite, Greek and Roman cities.

Returning north, take Route 375 into the green Valley of Elah, where the young David slew Goliath with his slingshot. The Elah brook still gurgles as it did in David's day. Also in the area is the Sorek cave, a small but extraordinary stalactite cave discovered during blasting at a nearby quarry in 1967. The lighting installed by the Israel Parks Authority has won international praise for the way it highlights the natural colours and shapes to best advantage.

Another destination off Highway 1, about 32 kilometres from Tel Aviv, is the Trappist Monastery of Latrun. Visitors may tour the monastery and sample the monks' wines, fiery brandy, olive oil and honey.

From Latrun, take Route 3 to Kibbutz Tal Shahar and the well-known Soreq Winery. The grounds of the kibbutz make a delightful picnic stop.

Nearer to Jerusalem, on the north side of the highway, the village of Abu Ghosh boasts an elegant crusader church, built in 1142, and a monastery where the Ark of the Covenant rested for 20 years before King David took it to Jerusalem.

A prosperous Arab town, Abu Ghosh also boasts the irreverent Elvis Inn, a fun restaurant and shrine celebrating the life of the modern pop idol.

ALON NASHMON PLAYS ALPHONSE AT BLOOR JCC

Alon Nashman, the versatile actor who appeared in Reading Hebron, Easy Lenny Lazmon and many other well-noted plays, takes on multiple roles in the award-winning one-man play Alphonse, by Montreal playwright Wajdi Mouawad.

Alphonse is "a fantasia on the imagination of a child," a boy who embarks on a "coming-of-age pilgrimage." A powerful play for young people, it deals with adult questions in a highly theatrical and imaginative manner, and is suitable for adults and children aged seven or higher.

The play is presented by the Fringe Festival and Theaturtle, which describes itself as "a cutting-edge, super creative, Jewish inspired theatre [company] in Toronto."

"We're a young company with deep roots," says artistic director Nashman, who established Theaturtle in 1998. "We draw on Jewish source texts, history, music and spirit, and attempt to derive their meaning in a contemporary context."

Bloor JCC, Courtyard Playground ("where the sun always shines"), 750 Spadina Ave. Adults $8, children $5. Multiple performances at various times between July 6 and 16. Fringe Hotline, 416-966-1062.

A Revue Returns: Due to popular demand, the Civic Light Opera Company is restaging The MGM Revue, which features musical sequences from famous Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer movie musicals including Singin'in the Rain, Gigi, The Wizard of Oz, An American in Paris and many others. The previous production, at the Fairview Library Theatre in March, was sold out.

Eye on Arts

By Bill Gladstone

One of the revue's stars is Carol Kugler, preschool music specialist at Toronto's Temple Sinai. Kugler won attention in the company's spring production of State Fair. The production also features Bob Deutsch, Lisa Malcolm, Joe Cascone and many others.

The MGM Revue is at the Fairview Library Theatre, North York, for three performances before starting a tour of southern Ontario. July 23 & 24. Adults $15. 416-203-7839.

Freedman's Weighty Drama: Susan Freedman, who claims to weigh 110 pounds, is staging her hit one-woman show Fifty-Seven And Still Lying About My Weight! as part of the upcoming Toronto Fringe Festival.

The 45-minute show is a "funny and moving object lesson in being a survivor," says the writer-actor, who has been called "a modern-day success story" by the National Post. Her show runs July 6 to 16 at the Helen Gardiner Phelan Theatre, 79A St. George St. $8. 416-862-2222.

Also featured in the Fringe Festival is Breaking Legs! a wry comedy about what goes on behind the scenes in the theatre business. The playwright is Alphra Zimmerman, who also takes a role in the seven-person cast. Poor Alex, July 7 to 15. $8. 416-862-2222.

Arts Briefs

• A collection of 31 rare etchings by Rembrandt are on view at the Odon Wagner Gallery, 196 Davenport Rd. 416-962-0438.

• The Toronto Fringe Festival's 24-Hour Playwrighting Contest is accepting applications for its upcoming contest (July 6) in which participants are given a group of locations, objects and concepts that must be incorporated into their scripts. Top prize is $300. 416-966-1062.

• Professional hypnotist Mike Mandel has rescheduled a two-day workshop after dust from an office renovation led to a severe allergic reaction. Previous ticket-holders please note that a "dust-check" policy is in effect. Places are still available for the workshop, slated for July 8 and 9. $699. 416-750-7999.

• Comedian, singer, actress and writer Sandra Bernhard returns to Massey Hall with her new Broadway show I'm Still Here ... Damn It! June 21, 8 p.m. $29.50-$49.50. 416-872-4255.

• Folk singer Noah Zacharin is releasing his third CD aLIVE on June 29 at the Tranzac, 292 Brunswick Ave. (just south of Bloor). Doors open 8:30, music starts at 9 p.m.

The Travellers: Almost 50 years of folk tunes

By KATHRYN KATES
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — For almost 50 years The Travellers have been singing songs of brotherhood and peace – always available to lend their talents to causes they strongly believe in.

On June 24, at 8 p.m. the Canadian folk group will be performing at a concert in support of the Performing Arts Lodges of Canada in the courtyard of the PAL's downtown location at 110 The Esplanade.

This is the third year The Travellers have joined other entertainers to perform at PAL to raise awareness and funds for this organization which provides affordable housing and care for senior members of Canada's entertainment industry.

"This fundraising concert allows PAL to keep on doing what they are doing, housing still vibrant entertainers, now retired, but not retired from life, who didn't make much money working in the Canadian entertainment industry," says Jerry Gray, 66, one of the founding members of The Travellers and the only original still in the group.

Joining The Travellers for this concert and a few other appearances is founding member Sid Dolgay, who initiated the connection between PAL and The Travellers. The evening's entertainment will include Nancy White, Rick Fielding, Bill Garrett and Sue Lothrop with Curly Boy Stubbs.

The Travellers began in 1953 as an offshoot of the United Jewish People's Order's youth singers - a group that sang at union meetings and Jewish functions.

In addition to Gray and Dolgay, the original lineup included Gray's sister Helen, Oscar Ross and Jerry Goodis.

"We were attuned to the left of centre, we sang songs of the world and focused on Canada. In the '50s that wasn't an easy thing to do because of the McCarthy era," explains Gray.

"In 1954 we heard Pete Seeger sing the Woody Guthrie song, This Land Is Your Land, Pete told us we could do it because nobody in the States was going to sing it for a long time. So we changed the words to Canadian place names and recorded it for the first time in 1956. It struck a chord in the Canadian psyche. Canada was looking for a song that was different from the official national anthem at the time, God Save The Queen. Still to this day, we close every single program with that song."

While their left wing counterparts in the U.S. like Pete Seeger, Woody Guthrie and The Weavers were being blacklisted, The Travellers gained notoriety.

"I guess the greatest amount of acceptance came in 1964 when we were politically cleared to sing at a Command Performance in Charlottetown for Her Majesty the Queen of England and Prince Phillip," adds Gray.

Over the years the personnel of the group changed, although the current incarnation has been together for almost 30 years. It includes Joe Hampson, Ted Roberts, Don Vickery and Aileen Ahern.

The Travellers have recorded 16 albums and have plans to record a 17th next year. The album will be a collection of songs about the labour movement based on an album the group originally recorded 30 years ago.

Over the years The Travellers have shared stages with Ian and Sylvia, Gordon Lightfoot, Anne Murray, Peter Appleyard, Oscar Peterson, Theodore Bikel, Harry Belafonte, and many more. They have performed for Canadian peacekeepers around the world.

The groupwill be featured in a documentary slated for broadcast this fall on History Television.

Both the Canadian Labour Congress and The Musicians' Union have honoured The Travellers for a lifetime of service and for their vision for a better life for humanity.

"The Canadian music scene is such that it is virtually impossible to maintain a career for as long as we have. I think we've done it by maintaining a sense of purpose and branching out. All the other members play with different groups and come together as The Travellers when we need to," states Gray, a retired dentist, now devoting his attention to The Travellers' busy concert schedule and to teaching a course this fall at the University of Toronto called Canadian Folk, Protest and Labour Music.

Tickets for the PAL concert cost $20 are available at the door or by phoning 416-777-9674.

Judaism: A Quest For Meaning

TVO series doesn't pull any punches

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

The paradoxes and challenges of modern Jewish life in the new millennium are the key themes of a new 12-part TVOntario series, Judaism: A Quest for Meaning.

Produced by Sleeping Giant Productions, the first 30-minute episode gets under way on Friday, June 23 at 2:30 p.m.

Featuring interviews with rabbinical scholars like rabbis David Hartman, Dow Marmur and Arthur Hertzberg, the series examines Judaism from different angles: personal identity, women and feminism and the portrayal of God.

Judging by two episodes, the unifying theme which runs through the series is the tension between traditional Judaism and the modern forces of secularism, caused by the breakdown of a unified Jewish tradition after the Enlightenment.

Judaism, whose notions of ethics and justice laid the foundation of Western civilization, is beset by a sense of crisis today precisely because it is so tolerant a religion.

Rabbi Hartman, a resident of Jerusalem and a former spiritual leader of a Montreal synagogue, argues that Judaism survived a whole host of vicissitudes because it was bold and innovative. However, he calls for a "critical distance" of Judaism from the modern world.

Rabbi Michael Marmur, of the Hebrew Union College in Jerusalem, believes that there should be a balance between tradition and modernity.

Alan Dershowitz, a Harvard law professor and author who has dealt with Jewish issues, says that Judaism's challenge is to make Jewish learning relevant.

According to Rabbi Dow Marmur of Toronto's Holy Blossom Temple, God is beyond our comprehension.

Dershowitz claims that most smart people have or have had doubts about God. But to one Hebrew University scholar interviewed here, God is "the king of the universe," humanity's suffering notwithstanding.

These and other questions are intelligently debated and probed by Judaism, a series that does not pull its punches.

Memories of Gold, Lizzies Old Timer looks back

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Set the controls on the Way-Back Machine to the 1920s, back before the NHL was a six-team league, back to when $2.50 and a free meal was a good pay day, back to when Babe Ruth was a young star recently traded to the New York Yankees.

That's how far back you've got to go to have seen Bill Gold in his prime, as a peach-fuzzed teenager playing hardball in the Elizabeth Playground and other playing fields in central Toronto.

Gold, who turns 95 in July, has seen it all. He can recall Alex Levinsky as a damn good baseball player, better on the diamond than on the ice with the Toronto Maple Leafs; he remembers major leaguer Goody Rosen as a young whippersnapper, always with a baseball glove on his hand; he remembers when weekends were for baseball and youngsters thought nothing of playing three games in a single day; and he remembers playing on all-Jewish teams and striking a blow against anti-Semitism by winning city and provincial championships despite the racist taunts he and his teammates endured.

On June 22, his old teammates will honour and pay tribute to him at the Lizzies Old Timers Association annual dinner in the Bob Abate Recreation Centre, 485 Montrose Ave.

Besides bringing together old friends, the dinner will raise money to support local athletes. (Call Norm Cornack at 416-749-6735 or Harvey Bronstine at 905-886-6580 for more information.)

In its heyday, which goes back to at least 1920 and runs until the war, the Lizzies was the quintessentially Jewish sports club, even though the man who founded it, Bob Abate, was of Italian descent, and even though non-Jewish neighbourhood boys were welcome to participate.

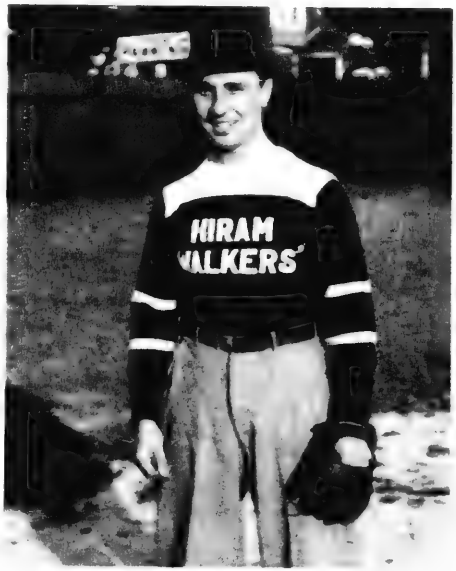
Still, look at the lineup of teams from the '20s and '30s and you'll see a host of Jewish names. Prominent among them, beginning around 1916, was Bill Gold.

As Gold tells the story, he was 10 or 11 when Abate gave him a football and asked to see him punt. He hit the ball so well it soared out of the playground and landed on the sidewalk, smashing four bottles being collected for deposit.

Abate paid the seven cents for the broken bottles and quickly recruited Gold for the Lizzies. By the time he was 14, Gold was a multi-sport athlete playing hardball, softball, basketball and hockey. In one year, the Lizzies won championships in hardball, softball, basketball and even quoits, which Gold describes as a form of horseshoes.

"I spent most of my time in the playground," he recalled. "That's why kids didn't get into trouble in those days. They were too busy stealing second instead of stealing cars."

With the solid grounding in baseball fundamentals he got at the Lizzies playground, Gold went on to a pretty solid softball career as an adult. In around 1930, as a member of Herzl Zion, an all-Jewish softball team, he won an Ontario championship.



In 1927, Bill Gold was a youthful 22-year-old infielder (top). In 1994, he and this wife, Lil, celebrate their 60th wedding anniversary (left).

About 3,000 mostly Jewish fans used to turn out at Bellwood Park, near Dundas, to watch them play, he recalled.

In road games, "we had to fight our way through every town we played ball in," he said. That didn't necessarily mean resorting to fisticuffs, but it did mean playing through taunts of "get the Jews," which were common in those days.

At five foot eight, 145 pounds, Gold was not big, but like others of his era, he was tough. When he was about 17, Abate started him in boxing. Gold occasionally fought in three-round matches that served as entertainment at men's stags. He got paid $2.50 and a free meal and thought he was in heaven.

As a featherweight, Gold won the Newsboy Tournament and the YMHA Tournament. His career came to an end after the City of Toronto finals. As he recalls it, he landed one good punch, but his opponent landed two and afterwards, he thought he might do better in other sports.

In hindsight, "I'm glad I got beat up because a lot of my friends who stayed in it are punch-drunk," he said. "The guy who beat me ended up in the nut house."

At about age 30, Gold gave up serious sports competition – other than some softball action at the cottage – and concentrated on business and raising a family.

He married Lillian Gallander and got into the hotel business, where he worked for 35 years. Eventually he owned several downtown establishments including the Barclay, which is today the site of a parking lot at Front and Simcoe.

Fifty years ago, the Barclay could attract some top notch entertainment, including singer/dancer Sammy Davis Jr. and comedian Alan King.

It also attracted its fair share of underworld figures. "I knew a lot of criminals but they were good with me… They were tough when they were in a group but I had no trouble with them."

Gold still likes to keep active. He plays the odd round of golf and he watches sports on TV. Today's athletes "are all overpaid," he maintains.

According to today's standards, "Conacher, Apps and Primeau would get $30 million a year," he said.

As for baseball players, don't get him started on that. "There are few Lou Gehrigs or Ty Cobbs left now. There are a few good ones… but they all get AA pitching."

Spoken like a true expert, like someone who's seen it all. After all, how many people today can compare Conseco to Cobb, or Arnott to Apps and say they've seen all the greats

'There are few Lou Gehrigs or Ty Cobbs now.'

Stories that touch the heart

By ELI RUBENSTEIN ALEC GELCER

First Impressions

On a recent trip, we happened to meet the principal of an afternoon Jewish school in New Jersey. When the principal found out that one of us was the director of the March of the Living in Canada, she immediately remarked that many students from New Jersey had experienced terrible anti-Semitism on their trips to Poland during the March of the Living.

We shared with her that this was not our experience, and while Canadian students have sometimes encountered hostility, they have also been greeted by young Polish Christians who wanted to welcome our students to their country.

Part of the problem, we suggested, was attitude. If you go to Poland looking only for anti-Semitism, that's pretty much all you will find. If you enter Poland with an open mind, you may still encounter the hostility of some, but your eyes will not be shut to the welcoming gestures of others.

She then told us the following story:

Her afternoon school was being renovated, so she had to rent space in the local public school. The custodian was not very happy, because the Hebrew school would be using the building from 3 to 9 p.m., when the school was not usually occupied. This would double his workload – to be there in the morning and early afternoon for the regular public school students, and in the late afternoon and evening for the Jewish students.

The custodian was, moreover, a towering, gruff Ukrainian, who did not seem to take a liking to the principal or her Jewish charges.

One day, as the principal walked through the halls, she happened across the custodian standing outside a classroom, tears streaming down his cheeks.

She asked what had upset him. Perhaps, she pondered, one of her students had been rude to him, or had damaged school property.

He responded: "You see, those little boys and girls chanting the aleph-bais. I haven't heard that singsong in 60 years, since I was a child growing up in Ukraine.

"When I was a little boy, my best friends were the Jewish kids. We used to play in the streets, and when they had to go to their cheder, I would follow them to the doorway of their classrooms. There, I would anxiously wait outside, until they could come out and play again, all the while listening to them chant the aleph-bais.

"And then the Nazis came, and all my friends disappeared. After that, I never saw them again. And, when I heard your students chanting the aleph-bais, all of these memories from my childhood came rushing back to me. I'm sorry."

The principal told us the man became the best friend the school could ever have hoped for, and they are still in touch to this day, long after they left the premises where he worked. She added that he now lives in the United States.

Last year, she said, he returned to Ukraine, and when he came back to the United States, he brought a brick from the destroyed synagogue in his home town and presented it to the Jewish school.

"At least a small part of the synagogue should be near Jewish people again," he said.

About Life

Dear Ella,

My cousin Shulamit, her husband and their two children, eight and 10 years old, have decided to come for a visit from Israel for a couple of weeks this summer.

They were here a few years ago and I offered to let them stay with us then, as I thought it would work out well. We also have two children a bit older than theirs.

It was a disaster. They expected everything to be done for them. They wanted breakfast every morning, dinner every night and the use of our car in between. Their kids were horribly behaved, and my kids followed their example.

My husband and I work full time and don't have the time or the energy for a repeat of their last holiday.

How do you suggest I get out of this without insulting anyone?

No Welcome Mat

Dear No Welcome Mat

I understand this is a difficult subject to approach; however it must be done – and soon. Your cousins may be planning their whole trip on the assumption that they are staying with you. Don't let this get too far. Don't let them buy tickets and make arrangements only to find out things are not as peachy as they may have thought.

Explain to them that with the two of you working full time you find it too difficult to house them for two weeks, but you will be happy to enjoy their company when you are off work, for a few dinners, shows or other activities.

Suggest an alternative place for them to stay, possibly in the heart of downtown where they can enjoy many tourist attractions. Get them maps, rates, e-mail addresses. Do whatever you can to make the transition from your home to a hotel as easy as possible.

I'm not saying this will happen without any hard feelings, but it will be far worse if they book a flight and then find out your home is not available to them.

Their reaction will depend on their personalities. Do your best and don't feel guilty.

Verdict expected July 1

Jewish Telegraphic Agency and CJN wire services

NEW YORK — The verdict in the trial in Shiraz, Iran, of the 13 Jews and four Muslims accused of spying for Israel is expected this Saturday, according to a report in the New York Times.

Trial of Iranian 13

Citing an Agence France-Presse report, the newspaper said that the trials had ended last Saturday and the verdict will be announced by the chief justice on July 1.

Shiraz' chief justice, Hossen Ali Amiri, said last week that the charge of "waging war against God and the country," which carries the death penalty, had been dropped for the 13 Jews.

Eight of the Jewish defendants have "confessed" to the spying charges, but their lawyer challenged the validity of the confessions. One of the accused claimed he had gathered but did not disseminate information.

Four of the Jews recanted their "confessions," charging that officials had elicited the admissions through coercion. Moreover, one of the Muslims accused of aiding the Jews refused to corroborate the charge.

BUSY WEEK FOR BARAK: Last week was yet another eventful week for Israel's Prime Minister Ehud Barak. He met in Jerusalem with United Nations Secretary General Kofi Annan one day after protesters noisily expressed their opposition to the government's peace policies. Also during the week, Barak orchestrated a last-minute solution to the coalition crisis with the Shas Party, thus saving his government from collapse.

Prozzäk: the cartoon rock band

By ANNA MORGAN
CJN Staff

TORONTO — Legend has it that sometime in the future there will be a great war. During the fiercest battle of all, two warriors are chosen to be transported to the present in a search for the key to their destiny – true love.

Simon and Jason

And so, Prozzäk, a rock band based on two cartoon characters – Simon and Milo – was born.

The legend and characters are part of a story portrayed in their first album, Hot Show, which has gone triple Platinum and was nominated for five Juno awards.

Jason Levine, as he is known in real life or Simon, as he is known in cartoon life, is working on the continuation of Simon's quest in Prozzäk's upcoming second CD, which they plan to release sometime in the fall.

"Prozzäk has evolved – we've become much better musicians and Simon, as a character, will be going into a much darker period. He'll be getting more cynical."

In the next album, for example, there will be a song titled Pretty Girls Make Me Nervous and in it there will be three professionals – a dentist, a doctor and a lawyer. These are the three professions I'm "supposed to feel guilty" about not being, he said.

"Simon is based on my own Jewish personality," Levine said.

The News in Brief

CANADA

Teddy Libfeld Dies

TORONTO — Teddy Libfeld, one of Toronto's most prolific homebuilders, died recently at age 72. Libfeld and his four sons operated several companies, including the Conservatory Group, which developed condominiums, and Viewmark, which built low-rise homes. A child survivor of Auschwitz, Libfeld arrived in Toronto in 1951 and began building homes in 1957.

Family Seeks Help

RICHMOND HILL — The family of a 23-year-old employee killed in January in a botched jewelry store robbery has appealed to the public for help. Tzvi Erez and his sister Hila, have asked for help in identifying the occupants of two vehicles used to observe the shop in the days before the heist, in which Niv Erez was killed by gunshots and store owner Mark Lash was wounded. The first vehicle is described as a 1993 to 1995 Mercedes Benz, silver or grey, two-door convertible. The other vehicle identified is a 1999 Toyota 4-Runner. Niv Erez was a graduate of Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto (CHAT). Anyone with information is asked to call police at 905-773-1221, ext. 7865 or Crime Stoppers at 1-800-222-8477.

Grant for Zareinu

THORNHILL — Zareinu Education Centre has been awarded a $181,000 grant from the Ontario Trillium Foundation, the MPP for Thornhill, Tina Molinari, announced last week.

Schipper Honoured

TORONTO — Lawyer Lionel Schipper was awarded an honorary doctor of laws degree from the University of Toronto's law school at spring convocation last week. A U of T alumnus, Schipper played a leading role in the creation of the Bora Laskin Law Library. He has also been a major contributor to the J. Richard and Dorothy Shiff Chair in Jewish Studies in the faculty of arts and science, and to other chairs in the faculties of law and medicine.

Universities Partner

VANCOUVER — A new memorandum of understanding signed between Simon Fraser University and Ben-Gurion University of the Negev has formalized a growing partnership between the two institutions. The move recognizes the universities' commitment to joint fund-raising to foster a wide range of exchanges, study programs and field schools.

ISRAEL

'Ready to Die'

JERUSALEM — The Palestinian Authority's justice minister, Freih Abu Medein, said last week that Palestinians are ready to suffer "thousands" of casualties in the event of a military confrontation with Israel.

War Crime Arrest

JERUSALEM — The Simon Wiesenthal Centre here has applauded the recent arrest by German police of Anton Malloth, an alleged Nazi war criminal who was involved in the murder of Jewish inmates at the Kleine Festung (Small Fortress) in Theresienstadt.

WORLD

Petition for Iranians

NEW YORK — The Conference of Presidents of Major American Jewish Organizations has launched a continent-wide effort to gather one million names on a petition calling on Iran to release the 13 Iranian Jews being tried for spying for Israel. As well, the Simon Wiesenthal Centre, at www.wiesenthal.com, is organizing an Internet petition calling on Iran's leaders to intervene and release the Jews.

Cantor Bagley Feted

NEW YORK — Cantor David Bagley of Beth Radom Congregation in Toronto was honoured here this week by the Cantorial Council of America for his career in the cantorate. Four cantors from New York, Toronto and Montreal presented a musical tribute. The councils of chazzanim in Toronto and Montreal have also published a new volume of Cantor Bagley's compositions. As well, the council marked its 40th anniversary.

Group Recognized

MOSCOW — Russia's Interior Ministry has granted official recognition to the Chabad Lubavitch-dominated Federation of Jewish Communities. The move elevates the federation's status to that of its chief rival, the Russian Jewish Congress, and is expected to heighten tensions between the two groups.

UJC Budget

NEW YORK — The umbrella organization for North American Jewish federations, the United Jewish Communities, has approved a $41.7 million budget – $4.4 million less than its predecessor organizations spent before they merged.

Last Jew Dies

OSWIECIM — The last Jew living in Oswiecim, the town near the site of the Auschwitz death camp, died recently at 72. Shimshon Klueger had been living as a recluse.

Rabbi Faces Possible Death Penalty

PHILADELPHIA — Calling the move both "necessary and appropriate," local prosecutor Lee Solomon announced last week that a grand jury has returned a three-count indictment charging Rabbi Fred Neulander with capital murder, felony murder and conspiracy in connection with the Nov. 1, 1994 murder of his wife, Carol Neulander, in their Cherry Hill, N.J., home.

Solomon stated that his office would seek to have the rabbi held without bail.

Rabbi Neulander is currently free on $400,000 bail on charges of accomplice murder and conspiracy to commit murder – charges that carry a maximum sentence of life imprisonment with no possibility of parole for 30 years.

The maximum penalty on the new charges is death.

The prosecutor noted that the matter had received "the same careful, deliberate review which is undertaken in all potentially capital cases."

The new indictment follows the guilty pleas of the two confessed hit men in the alleged murder-for-hire. Both men await sentencing in the Camden County Correctional Facility.

No Jerusalem pavilion at Caravan

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — For the first time in two decades, there is no Jerusalem pavilion at this year's Caravan, Toronto's annual multicultural festival.

"The only reason is that we couldn't locate a site," said Pearl Gladman, national director, centre for community action of B'nai Brith Canada, which has co-sponsored the pavilion with the Bloor JCC since 1980.

The Bloor JCC, longtime home of the pavilion, is undergoing renovation. "Hopefully, next year we'll be back with them," said Gladman.

Caravan 2000 opened on June 23 and runs until July 1. At least three other participants who joined B'nai Brith to look for a large joint location were unable to obtain a suitable site, according to Gladman. B'nai Brith also scouted other locations, she added.

This year's event features 20 pavilions, down from 30 last year. Locations should be accessible by public transit and near at least a couple of other pavilions so people can hit two or three in a night, Gladman said.

"It was very disappointing for us, because we wanted to be part of it," she said. "We were disappointed we weren't able to show the general public the fun side of Israel instead of the political side."

In past years the Jerusalem pavilion, which has won Caravan awards, featured Israeli entertainment, a shuk (market) and kosher food like hummus and pita. It was staffed by volunteers from B'nai Brith's dozen Toronto lodges.

At its height, said Gladman, thousands of visitors would pass through during the week. "Strange as it may seem, Saturday nights [when the pavilion would open only after Shabbat] were our busiest nights."

The pavilion's longest serving mayor and chair, Monty Mazin, who presided over the festivities for four years in the early 1990s, was sad to hear this year's news. "I really enjoyed what I did at Caravan," he said. "I loved it."

Mazon Canada hits new allocation record

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Mazon Canada continues to raise the bar on its bi-annual allocations, distributing a record $325,402 in the spring of 2000 to organizations that help feed the hungry.

That figure is up slightly from its fall 1999 allocation of $321,860, but is a marked increase over Mazon's early years. It took the organization, which calls itself the Jewish response to hunger, 6½ years – from 1987 to 1992 – to raise its first $300,000 in total.

"Although we are thrilled to be able to make such a meaningful contribution into the national fight against hunger, we are sad to say that the number of Canadians requiring our help has not declined despite the improvement in our economy. It seems that more and more families and individuals are in great need," said Jacqueline Kott-Wolle, executive-director of Mazon.

With the spring 2000 allocation, Mazon has transferred $2.7 million to hunger relief organizations since it was created in 1987. Mazon has succeeded in raising its profile in the Montreal and Toronto Jewish communities, generating a regular cash flow from the sale of its all occasion cards and from asking supporters to contribute three percent of their simchah food costs to the organization

In March, Mazon introduced its first-ever Kosher Food Fest in Toronto. Held at Roy Thomson Hall, it generated $80,000, Kott-Wolle said.

"Our gala was a tremendous success," she stated. "The next one is already set for March 26, 2001."

Modelled on the older, more established Montreal event, Toronto organizers hope to match the $200,000 raised last year in Montreal.

Politics as usual, alas

From the editor's desk

The summer months yawn before us, inviting us to "slow down" a little, to take a break from the normally busy routine and to focus more on leisure than on treasure. Indeed, most of us would like to.

But there is a distraction this summer that is preventing many of us from "slowing down" in a manner commensurate with our needs. The distraction is, simply, the unignorable incongruity between the lazier personal pace that hotter temperatures demand and the heightened civic diligence that hotter political activities demand.

Thus far, merely one week into the summer, politics – at all levels, at home and abroad – has sizzled. No respite looms on the hazy summertime horizon. But we owe it to ourselves, our children and our society to maintain a "watch" on these developments. That watch, unfortunately, will militate against a substantially slower summer pace.

Many of us, erroneously but not surprisingly, tend to draw conclusions about the nature of the system based on the behaviour of some of the system's "leaders." We become cynical about the "overall design" when it is the "interior decoration" causing the dissonance.

No greater harm can result to a democratic design than the disenchantment and distancing of the governed from the system of their government that is spawned by recurring cynicism.

This is especially so when the youth of our society begin to dissociate and then to unattach themselves from society's institutions. For it is often true that the behaviour of the youngster often becomes the habit of the adult. And how devastating it would be for all of us if distrust of and apathy for our system of government were to become habitual among the adults of the next generation.

And yet, this is not an outrageous or far-fetched possibility in light of some recent political developments and behaviours. I will list only a few examples. The numbers, alas, are far greater.

• The Canadian Alliance leadership contest has been reduced to two candidates: Preston Manning and Stockwell Day. The runoff ballot will be held on July 8. The country eagerly awaits the outcome of the runoff because it is vitally important that there be a strong opposition in the House of Commons (indeed in every legislative assembly), something there has not been since the Reform party became a leaderless Alliance party.

But last weekend's leadership contest reminded us that there are abundant ideological and identity questions still hovering over the federal Alliance party and the federal and provincial Conservative parties, like a sticky, black cloud.

For example before he delivered his speech to party members, Day was introduced by Alberta's Conservative premier, Ralph Klein. Or, after the abysmal showing by Tom Long, federal Conservative leader Joe Clark issued a plea for "fiscal conservatives, but socially tolerant" Alliance members (read here Ontario members signed by Long) to return to the Conservative party fold. Or even further, Long was himself the key advisor to Ontario Conservative premier Mike Harris before he became a candidate for the Alliance leadership.

What does this easy, seemingly fluid interchangeability between parties and party loyalties say about the candidates, or, even more tellingly, about the true identities of the provincial premiers, their governments and the two federal parties in question?

What are observers, let alone voters, to think about the policy and other distinctions between parties and about the integrity of party leaders who make representations to voters based on the "selling" of policy distinctions, supposedly authentic, between the parties?

• Prime Minister Jean Chrétien has virtually announced the holding of a federal election in the near future. He "teases" the public with occasional hints and unveiled allusions to an imminent election as if the subject were nothing more than his personal plaything. When he adopts this coy almost mischievous demeanor, what impression does he convey about the seriousness of the matter?

In addition, last week he appointed two senators to the Upper Chamber. Setting aside the issue of the character, intelligence and suitability of the two appointees, the very fact of the appointments totally disregards the preference, especially in western Canada and probably among the majority of Canadians, for reconsidering the nature and role of the Senate.

Even though the issue of Senate reform is part of a much larger debate, and even though these recent appointments were part of a strategy to ensure the passage of the Clarity Bill through the Senate, the apparently cavalier disregard by the prime minister of the desire for Senate reform – as exemplified by his "routine" appointments – sends an unwelcome message to the public. Politics will always be as usual and not responsive.

• The near collapse of the coalition government of Prime Minister Ehud Barak before it was "rescued," literally, by last minute manoeuvres made some people shake their heads in disbelief and disgust.

Setting aside, again, the merits of the grievances of the government's Shas coalition partner, the fact of the bargaining and the manner in which it was conducted – brazen, totally in the public eye and based, it seemed, entirely upon self-interested financial considerations – regrettably, brought the entire system into disrepute.

Yes, it is summer. We should slow down; but the distractions are so many.

Jews must unite to help brethren, says Hoenlein

By REBECCA NADLER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — The challenge facing Jewish people in the 21st century is to work together to help Jews around the world, says the executive vice-chair of the Council of Presidents of Major Jewish Organizations.

To do otherwise, says Malcolm Hoenlein, is to invite discord and disunity which will destroy the Jewish community.

Hoenlein, who recently addressed an Aish HaTorah gala dinner honouring Herb and Joyce Green and the five rabbis who founded the organization in Toronto, called the Iranian situation a wake-up call to the community.

"Jews just don't get it...they don't realize what a difference a single person can make," said Hoenlein.

Hoenlein praised MP Irwin Cotler, who spearheaded Canada's role in opposing the imprisonment and espionage trials of 13 Iranian Jews.

Anti-Semitism, Hoenlein said, has not disappeared. He talked about last year's shootings in San Diego and Chicago, the anti-Semitic rhetoric that was common - place during the recent elections in Russia, and the right-wing parties that consistently attract 10 to 20 percent of the popular vote in many countries across Europe.

"What we thought exemplified the 19th century is with us in the 21st century," he said.

Hitler tested the world with Kristallnacht and by enacting the Nuremberg Laws, and the world reaction was silence, he said.

When President Franklin D. Roosevelt was asked by the press for his reaction to the destruction and violence of Kristallnacht, said Hoenlein, his response was "We have no plans for the Jews."

When Hitler heard this, said Hoenlein, he understood that the world did not care about the Jews.

Hoenlein said that recent events show that little has changed.

"Where is the United Nations and Security Council when the people of Sudan, Rwanda and Zaire need them? Where is the outcry of the world?"

He praised the world community for their reaction to the trials of the 13 Iranian Jews. "They are guilty of nothing other than being Jews. They have been held for 16 months without a shred of evidence and their trials are behind closed doors. The trial judge is also the prosecutor and jury. Yet the outcry that has been heard worldwide has made a difference."

Because of pressure from the international community, he said, we have witnessed a number of firsts.

For the first time in Iranian history, the accused were allowed to have defence lawyers, though their access was limited; visitation rights were granted; kosher food was provided; and the Friday morning diatribes of Muslim clergy have been toned down.

"When I look back I know that there is not anything more that could have been done," Hoenlein said.

"This has become the number 1 human rights case in the world because people care. Sixty countries, including Muslim and Arab states spoke out against the trials." This could only happen when people stand together and help each other. Now all we

Mayor Mel is shul's humanitarian of the year

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Mel Lastman's reward as mayor of Toronto is the daily gratification of making the city a better place, he told a capacity crowd last week as he was honoured by the brotherhood of Beth Sholom Synagogue.

"I do not feel entitled to receive awards for something I really love to do," he said.

Lastman became the 49th recipient of the Beth Sholom brotherhood's annual Humanitarian Award at a dinner June 20 attended by over 500 people. Previous honourees include Prime Minister Jean Chrétien, Ontario's former lieutenant-governor Lincoln Alexander, immigration lawyer Mendel Green and theatre impresario Ed Mirvish.

Lastman, 67, is respected by everyone, said last year's honouree George Cohon, who served as auctioneer for one of Toronto's herd of over 300 handpainted fibreglass moose.

Mel Moose, a creation of artist Charles Pachter sporting the chain of office, and metal coils representing transplanted plugs of hair, was sold for $24,000 to media.com. The money raised by moose sales goes to charity, noted Cohon.

The mayor had no reason to spearhead the moose project, other than that it is good for the city, said Cohon. "Smiles are good for everybody."

Among Lastman's other projects, he plans a massive waterfront redevelopment, tied in with Toronto's bid for the 2008 Olympics. But "with or without the Olympics, the waterfront is a must," said the mayor.

He also spoke of a deal to buy Union Station and make it "a gateway" to the city at no new cost to taxpayers. "This will happen and the waterfront will happen," he said.

The waterfront project will cost over $12 billion, over $7 billion of which will come from the private sector, Lastman said. The remainder will be paid by government funds over a period of 20 years. The acquisition of Union Station will not be at any new cost to taxpayers, he said.

Lastman will leave his mark on the city, said former award recipient and former Metro Chair Paul Godfrey, who praised the mayor for running the amalgamated city better than the chair and six mayors who, together, ran it previously.

The mayor has been a benefactor to all the ethnic groups, said former recipient Johnny Lombardi, founder of the multi-cultural CHIN radio station. Toronto, it was noted, is home to people from 169 countries, speaking over 100 languages.

Lastman was also praised for his task force on homelessness and his fight for federal and provincial funds to address homelessness issues. As well, he stimulated Toronto's economy with a three-year tax freeze, noted Jack Herson, brotherhood president.

Paying tribute to Lastman's business roots, Godfrey noted the mayor's creativity in his pre-politics days, when he followed ice trucks and sold refrigerators to those who used iceboxes.

After three decades in politics, Lastman is as popular as ever, noted Godfrey. "How many politicians in their 31st year are more popular today than when they first started?"

The mayor uses an iron fist to cut spending and ensure law and order, and a velvet glove with the homeless, the aged and the young, said Godfrey.

Despite his hard work, Godfrey noted, Lastman is a family man who has his priorities right.

Rabbi Aaron Flanzraich, Beth Sholom's spiritual leader, noted that Lastman even came to say Kaddish on his father's yahrzeit in the middle of an election.

In his own speech, Lastman paid tribute to Marilyn, his wife of 46 years, for her support. The couple have raised $1.4 million for the arts in the past two years, it was noted in the evening's program.

Dale Lastman, whose brother Blayne also spoke, said he learned from his father to be honest, sincere, tolerant, respectful and true to himself.

"I suspect I learned modesty and humility somewhere else," he quipped.

URGENT APPEAL TO HELP A FELLOW JEW BLINDED FOLLOWING A VICIOUS ATTACK

Mr. Vizel, father of 17 children, was the victim of a vicious, senseless, anti-semitic attack in New York, that left him with severe head injuries and totally blind. As a result of the attack, Mr. Vizel is no longer able to provide for his family who now have the daunting responsibility of caring for their permanently disabled father.

No one should ever know the tragedy and suffering the Vizel family has endured and continues to endure. This once self-sufficient family has been reduced to relying on the generosity of their Jewish brethren for a meagre existence.

We ask everyone to help them in whatever way possible. There can hardly be a greater or more worthy Charitable donation.

Sincerely,
Toronto Rabbis: Amrom Assayag, Yeshua Fuhrer, Yitzchok Kirzner, Moshe M. Lowy, Shlome E. Miller, Duvid Pam, Baruch Taub & Dr. Allan Seidenfeld (campaign chairman) and Moshe Zolty.

A flame that must be extinguished

On motza'ei Shabbat, vandals believed to be Jewish smashed the windows of Kehillat Yaar Ramot, a Masorti (Conservative) synagogue on the northern hillside of Jerusalem and then threw burning rags inside the sanctuary, hoping, obviously, to set the house of assembly and worship ablaze. Some siddurim and chumashim were destroyed, as were some furniture and upholstery. The synagogue sustained smoke and water damage. None of the sifrei Torah, thankfully, were harmed.

But something else so very precious was indeed harmed by this uniquely craven and abusive act: the belief in the sanctity and sanctuary of a beit knesset, the belief in the inviolability, for all Jews, of the holy books and the belief that there were, in the hearts of all Jews, still some limits to the manifestations of disrespect and intolerance.

When the torches were tossed to set the synagogue ablaze, they also singed and blackened the steadfastness of our beliefs. It was the second time in three weeks that the synagogue had been attacked. Three weeks ago, vandals tried to set fire to the synagogue door and defaced it with graffiti.

Condemnations of the first attack may have been slow in arriving and perhaps relatively feeble, but there was no tardiness this time or equivocation by high and prominent officials.

Prime Minister Ehud Barak criticized the attempted arson as "a horrible act that chills the souls of all Jews. The act is especially shocking," the prime minister said, "having taken place in Jerusalem, the eternal capital of the state of Israel and of the Jewish people."

Diaspora Affairs Minister Michael Melchior said the "lack of tolerance that leads to violence is a disturbing symptom in Israeli society. Just as we condemn assaults on synagogues in the streets of Europe, we must display a redoubled vehemence in our condemnation of this act and explore all necessary means to bring the guilty to justice."

Chief Ashkenazi Rabbi Yisrael Lau expressed his condemnation "of any act of violence, whether it is against a man's dignity, his property, not to mention his life, whether committed against a building, or a building designated for the prayer of the members of movements like this one or any other."

Rabbi David Bateman, the spiritual leader of the synagogue, wounded, outraged, made the statement, a deeply felt cri de coeur that reverberates in all our consciences: "It's hard to imagine that any other Jew could perpetrate this kind of act of vandalism and destruction against a synagogue."

The flame that was tossed into Yaar Ramot must be extinguished. It was a flame of hatred and contempt. In its place the torch of mutual respect, acceptance and tolerance must be tossed into the hearts of all Jews with the hope of igniting ahavat Yisrael among us all.

ON TRIAL IN IRAN

The trial of the 13 Iranian Jews on charges of espionage resumed behind closed doors on May 1. Each of the accused has a name. Let us not forget them.

Condemns minister's decision

I am shocked and saddened by the Jewish community's thunderous silence concerning the fate of Chinese refugees who have been returned against their will to their homeland. Surely, the parallels with Jewish refugees from Germany in the 1930s are not only clear but uncanny. Have Jews lost their moral compass? Have they become so morally myopic that only parochial ethical questions concern them? Shame.

Jews fleeing the barbaric totalitarian regime in pre-war Germany were denied entry by the Liberal government of the day. Canada, they said, would not be the dumping ground for the refuse of Europe. So these refugees were forced to return to Germany to face concentration camps or worse. Canadian Jews, since that time, have been unanimous and vociferous in condemning this callous behaviour of our government. How ghastly then is the irony we face in Canada today. Several Chinese refugees fleeing a barbaric totalitarian regime in China have been repatriated from Canada at the behest of Elinor Caplan. These unfortunate souls will face, as their Jewish soulmates did in Hitler's Germany, concentration camps or worse. Indeed, the National Post reported recently that one of these refugees has been sentenced to death. Callously, incredibly, indeed shockingly, Caplan declared that she was "unswerving" in her determination to not let Canada become the dumping ground for other such people.

I urge all Canadians, but especially Canadian Jews, to not let this happen again. People risking life and limb to flee a tyrannical country must not be turned away from our shores because they lack the "proper credentials." That a Jewish immigration minister is doing this, is shameful beyond expression. Jews, of all people, must not be silent in the face of this moral madness. Caplan must reverse her decision or resign. Honour and decency permit no other course.

Laments skepticism of fellow Jews

Earlier this year, as reported in the CJN, a Reform congregation from St. Catharines merged with a Conservative congregation from Niagara Falls. The inaugural Shabbat service was attended by Canadian Jewish Congress representatives including Michael Soberman, who praised the members for putting aside stereotyping and rather, working together to find common spiritual and liturgical ground.

It has therefore been both puzzling and disheartening that some persons have shown reactions to the merger best described as patronizing or disdainful. Phrases such as "That's bizarre," or "Yes, but how long will it last?" sadly reflect a xenophobia and parochialism from individuals who otherwise loudly profess a worldly concern for Jewish survival.

In the Pirkot Avot, Ben Zoma says: "Who is wise? The person who learns from all." Rabbi Meir writes: "Look not at the bottle, look at what is in it." Is it so difficult to comprehend the union of persons from disparate backgrounds in a lifelong partnership based upon caring and mutual respect?

Hopeful signs in Catholic church

Your June 15th article "Rabbis, Priests discuss Marriage, Intermarriage" conveys well the good discussion and understanding that was promoted between the two groups.

Readers might be interested to know that the meeting was originally a Roman Catholic initiative of Rev. Damian MacPherson, director of the Archdiocesan Office of Ecumenical and Interfaith Affairs, and reflects increasing Catholic desire to learn sensitivity around issues of concern in the Jewish community. Father MacPherson approached Rabbi Philip Scheim of the Toronto Board of Rabbis who responded with enthusiasm.

After the long history of persecution and ignorance on the Church's part, and some misunderstandings and misreading of each other's motives still today, we think it is important for CJN readers to know when there are hopeful signs in the Catholic Church.

The Rocket was just too fast

I was most touched by the editorial on Rocket Richard. (CJN, June 1)

A very close and dear friend of mine, Gerard Voileau was a friend of the Rocket before the Rocket joined the Montreal Canadians at the age of 22. Their first coach was a Swiss Jew who was amazed by the speed of the Rocket. He told Rocket Richard that he was just too fast for the game and it would be a good idea if he thought of doing another sport. He thought that the Rocket would either harm himself or someone else.

I was terribly disappointed that in your caption (to the SeeJN photo in the issue of June 22) you chose the word "death" in association with the sixth yahrzeit since the passing of the Rebbe. In all printed material provided to The CJN, "passing" is the way I respectfully refer to the Rebbe. Why you elected to substitute a different word is beyond me.

Frankly it is disrespectful.

MORDECAI GEBIRTIG

Second part of a two part series.

By SIMCHA SIMCHOVITCH

As a result of the anti-Jewish policies of the Polish ruling circles in the late '30s, especially after the infamous pogrom in the town of Przytyk, in 1936, Gebirtig wrote his memorable song Undzer Shtetl Brent (Our Town Is Burning) in which he urged the people not to stand by idly "with folded arms" while the town is consumed by flames. The song ends with a desperate call for action before it is too late.

On fire! Brothers, it's burning!
If this town is dear to you,
take up the hoses, put out the fire,
douse it even with your own blood,
please show that you can do it.

Brothers, don't stand by calmly with folded arms.
Don't stand by,
Brothers, put out the fire –
our town is burning!

This was a prophetic song which foretold the approaching destruction of Polish Jewry. A year later, the Germans entered Krakow and soon after confined the Jews into the ghetto.

For some time, Gebirtig, together with his wife and two of his daughters, was exiled to Lagiewniki, a village near Krakow. His third daughter, Shifra, managed to escape to Lvov, then under Soviet occupation. At the beginning of 1942, Gebirtig with his family returned to the Krakow ghetto.

On June 4, known in the annals of Krakow Jewry as "bloody Thursday," most of the Krakow Jews were transported to the death camp of Belzhets where Gebirtig's wife and two daughters perished. Gebirtig himself was shot by a German soldier on the way to the deportation train. Shifra, the third daughter, perished when the Germans broke into the Soviet Union in June 1941.

During the more than two years that Gebirtig lived under German occupation, and in spite of the terrible conditions in the ghetto, he continued to write and composed a series of songs that reflect the tragic reality of Jewish life of that period.

In the song Zay Gezunt Mir Kroke (Stay Well, Krakow) the poet takes leave of his beloved hometown where his ancestors are buried. In S'tut Vey (It Hurts) he pillories the Polish neighbours who draw satisfaction from the sight of Jews maltreated by the Germans. In a song titled Minutn Fun Bitokhn (Minutes of Faith), Gebirtig encourages the tormented ghetto-Jews to be patient and not lose hope that the war will come to an end and bring defeat to the enemy.

And in the song Mayn Kholem (My Dream), the poet paints a vision of the day the Germans will be defeated, the whole world will rejoice, and people will spit on the despicable enemy who destroyed the lives of millions innocent men, women and children. However, neither Gebirtig nor anyone in his family were destined to reach that day.

One day before the fatal deportation of June 4, 1942, Mordecai Gebirtig's daughter, Lola, handed over two folders with her father's ghetto poems and other writings to Julia and Hanka Hofman, the daughters of Gebirtig's friend, the musician Julius Hofman. The two women survived and brought the material to Israel where it was given to the Moreshet Archives of the kibbutz Givat Haviva. Later, some of these manuscripts were transferred to the Jewish Institute of Research (YIVO) in New York.

Right after the war, in 1946, the Jewish Historical Commission of the Central Committee of Polish Jews issued a small publication entitled S'brent (On Fire) which contained 15 poems Gebirtig had written during the ghetto period, with the addition of Undzer Shtetl Brent which he had written before the war, in 1938.

In 1948, the Educational Department of the Workmen's Circle in New York published the first full edition of Gebirtig's known poems with their musical score. Titled Mayne Lider (My Songs) it contains Gebirtig's collection of Folkstimlekh (1920), Mayne Lider (1936) and S'brent (1945), all originally published in Krakow. In 1986, the Peretz Publishing House in Tel Aviv reprinted this edition in a handsome book which is still available at the Tel Aviv publisher.

However, this is not the end of the story. In 1997, a new Gebirtig book appeared in Israel titled Mayn Fayfele (My Little Flute) which contains 80 never before published poems, culled from the manuscripts of the Givat Haviva Archive and the YIVO in New York. These unknown poems were published in a de luxe edition, with an introductory essay by the Hebrew writer Nathan Gross, illustrated with original drawings by Alexander Bogen.

Only 12 poems are accompanied by music of Gebirtig's composition, the rest are without musical score. Most of these poems belong to the pre-World War I period of Gebirtig's writing, only a few were written, but not published, afterwards. Most of these newly discovered writings do not reach the artistic quality of Gebirtig's hitherto known poems, and this may be the reason why Gebirtig did not include them in the two collections published during his lifetime. However, they are of great interest for us, because they reveal new aspects of Gebirtig's life and personality.

As a young man, before he fell sick, Gebirtig was a feisty champion of the worker's cause as well as a romantic suitor of women with whom he fell in love before he married Blumka.

At that time, Gebirtig was closely associated with the Jewish social democratic organization, the forerunner of the Bund in Krakow. We find therefore, in this edition, a number of socialist propaganda poems, some of them published in the Yiddish socialist press in Poland and in the United States. Such are the declarative poems The General Strike or The First of May.

In several poems about the Jewish holidays, especially Passover, Gebirtig stresses the plight of the poor who feel even more depressed because they lack the means to buy the necessary food or clothing for their wives and children. In another poem about Passover, the grandson refuses to listen to the grandfather's tale of the exodus.

Instead, he wants to hear of the plight of the oppressed and exploited of his time. This social consciousness goes hand-in-hand with the poet's anti-militarism. He raves against the war speculators who enrich themselves on the suffering of the hungry population, and he calls the medals upon the chest of the war hero "murderous signs of Cain."

In the new collection, the children's poems are less sentimental and nostalgic than in the previously published childhood songs. Here, he describes more realistically the plight of the Jewish child in the obscurantist traditional Jewish school, the cheder.

A real surprise is the cycle of love poems we find in Mayn Fayfele. In his hitherto known poems, Gebirtig tells mostly of the pain or disappointment of thwarted love in general, but not in personal terms. But here we find genuine poems of love and adoration, longing and disappointment personally experienced by the poet.

Two other themes occupy a prominent place in the newly found material. One consists of personal lyrical outpourings caused probably by the poet's health problems. His heart condition and other disabilities cast a dark shadow on his life and cause him to feel angst and the fear of death. Thus, he tells us in one poem that after his heart attack, he lay six weeks in bed. He is not yet fully recovered, but has to return to the shop in order to provide for his family. On the other hand, we find here poems of jubilation for life as well as vivid descriptions of nature in the different seasons of the year.

As I mentioned already, an amazing and wonderful metamorphosis of Gebirtig's work occurred after World War II. He was discovered by a number of Jewish and non-Jewish scholars and musicians who were inspired by his life and martyrdom and by his sincere, heart-rendering songs.

Partial translations of his lyrics and music appeared in Hebrew, Polish and English. However, two non-Jewish musicians ventured to publish full editions of Gebirtig's songs, one in Italian, the other in German.

In Italy, in 1977, a de luxe edition appeared of All the Songs of Mordecai Gebirtig, with the Yiddish texts in Latin transliteration, the music, and the Italian translation by Laura Mitzner, with an introduction by the renowned Italian singer, Rudi Asumina.

The German folksinger and composer, Manfred Lemm of Wuppertal, Germany became even more involved with Gebirtig. In 1967, his ensemble was invited to perform in Israel, and he began to incorporate Hebrew and Yiddish songs in his repertoire. He then discovered some of Gebirtig's songs and was spellbound by their genuine beauty. From then on, Manfred Lemm began collecting Gebirtig's heritage and researching his life.

This led him to Poland, Israel, England, and the United States, where he gathered material, performed, lectured and conducted seminars on Gebirtig. He and his ensemble also produced two CDs with about 50 songs of Gebirtig, all sung in Yiddish.

In 1992, he published a large and complete edition of all of Gebirtig's known songs. The book includes the Yiddish text, a transliteration in Latin letters, a free German translation, and music arranged by Lemm. In addition, Lemm composed music to 20 Gerbirtig poems that didn't have musical notes.

In 1995, Lemm visited Toronto and gave a Gebirtig recital at the Goethe Institute. I attended the concert and have kept in touch with him since then. It was he who encouraged me to translate Gebirtig's lyrics into English for a possible edition similar to the one he compiled in German.

We can, therefore, comfort ourselves that Gebirtig's honest and heartfelt songs did not die with their master. His songs live and resound, in Yiddish and in translations, in many parts of the world.

A martyr remembered

Anton Schmid was a member of the German army. For some years, he has been remembered on the Avenue of the Righteous in Jerusalem. I recall seeing the name there, but I had no real idea who the honoree was.

Rabbi Gunther Plaut in Toronto

It so happens that lately the name has made the news, and here are some of the details which I found most interesting.

Schmid was an Austrian by birth and after his nation joined Nazi Germany he was, like all other young men of his age, inducted into the Nazi army.

In the fall of 1941, his unit was stationed in Vilna. There, Schmid became a witness to the mass murder the Einsatzgruppen of the Wehrmacht committed when they executed thousands of Jews.

Sergeant Schmid was horrified by what he saw and secretly managed to help Jews hide themselves. Schmid also obtained provisions and false documents for them. In this fashion, he saved 250 Jews and organized their flight. But he was caught, and in January 1942, was arrested, condemned to death, and executed in Vilna in April.

Now, more than half-a-century later, he has also been honoured in Germany. A military barracks complex, formerly named after Gen. Guenther Ruedel, has been renamed after Anton Schmid. He has thus become the first German soldier martyred because of the Holocaust to be honoured, and in a military institution to boot.

General Ruedel's name was chosen for removal, not because he served in the First and Second World Wars, but because he had been a judge in the People's Court, which had routinely condemned opponents of the Nazi regime to death.

Although Ruedel, himself, had never committed physical violence against Jew or non-Jew, his agreement and participation in the court were reason enough to withdraw the honour that had been previously bestowed upon him.

Fritz Stern, an American-Jewish historian, has characterized the renaming of the military complex as another sign of the new German attitude to the Holocaust.

Germany's defence minister, Rudolf Scharping, supported the honouring of Schmid and the dishonouring of Ruedel. He did this not without opposition, but persisted in the face of it, and that deserves special note.

Scharping, himself, attended the renaming ceremony, which took place on May 8, the 55th anniversary of Germany's capitulation, ending the European conflict in World War II.

In Scharping's address to army recruits, he said that Germans could not choose the type of history they liked, but instead should identify with their best tradition.

Wild west nurtured women of valour

It sounds like "believe it or not" scenarios – a Jewish woman as millionaire entrepreneur, as "girl rabbi of the golden West," as consort of Wyatt Earp.

The West has produced many individuals who broke free of the restrictions that 19th and early-20th-century Jewish women encountered. Here are some of their stories.

Jean M. Gerber in Vancouver

In 1863, Cecelia Davies came to Victoria, marrying businessman Francis Sylvester, the first Jew to settle permanently in Victoria (Jewish population of 242). Davies was a member of the Imperial Order of the Daughters of the British Empire. She volunteered at the French Hospital and the Royal Jubilee Hospital, and also raised money for the building of Temple Emanu-el. She was an outstanding hostess and society woman.

Davies' energy was matched by Rachel Goldbloom's, one of Vancouver's pioneering Jewish women, whose home was a centre for the Jewish community in the first years of the 20th century.

The role of hostess, enabler and volunteer is familiar. But how about the "girl rabbi of the golden West?"

During the Rosh Hashanah of 1893, Rachel Frank, a reporter from the San Francisco Chronicle, was sent to Spokane, Wash. Finding no synagogue, she looked for the town's Jewish "leaders" who made her an offer.

They would organize the service if she would deliver the sermon. Done!

Her sermon catapulted her to fame as a lecturer across the Pacific as far northwest as Victoria, B.C., where she conducted High Holy Day services.

Having only one semester of study at Hebrew Union College, she sidestepped offers of teaching and permanent pulpit connections, building her reputation on a lively and intelligent understanding of Judaism. She ended her days in Urbana, Ill. where she supported Jewish students on campus.

Elizabeth Fleishman-Ascheim grew tired of the social life expected of young Jewish ladies in San Francisco and established the first X-ray laboratory in the West in 1896. Physicians and dentists consulted with her, as did doctors treating the wounded of the Spanish-American War. The surgeon general of the U.S. army rated her one of the best radiographers in the country.

Unfortunately, like Marie Curie, she was not protected from the dangers of the newly discovered technology, and she died of radiation poisoning. A Jewish woman scientist – what will they think of next.

The I in I Magnin stands for Isaac, but it was not the Dutch Jewish father who founded and ran the business, but his wife, Mary Ann née Cohen. A seamstress by trade and mother of seven, Mary Ann built the business (30 stores across the West) and ran it until her death in 1943 at the age of 95. As a daily visitor to their flagship store, she checked the counters with white-gloved hands and trained her sons to follow in her footsteps. From the steerage of an immigrant ship to the drawing rooms of the West, Mary Ann carried her family all the way.

Wyatt Earp connection? "Josie" Sarah Marcus moved with her family to San Francisco in 1869, where German Jews had built a thriving community. You get a glimpse of that community in The Frisco Kid starring Gene Wilder and Harrison Ford. At age 18, she ran away from home with a travelling band of actors, eventually meeting the famous lawman in Benson, Ariz. In the aftermath of the shootout at OK Corral, Josie and Wyatt began their wanderings through the West.

They eventually became rich through their canteen in Alaska and their copper strike in Nevada, and remained devoted to each other throughout Wyatt's long life. Josie wrote her memoirs and while her example is one many of us would not like our daughters to emulate, she certainly introduces an element of adventure into the history of the Jewish women of the West.

With thanks to the Women's League of Portland, Ore. for the information in this column.

Celebrate our leaders, volunteers

This column will no longer be written from one of, if not the most northerly Jewish communities in Canada. From now on, I will be corresponding from the most southerly of Jewish centres – Windsor, Ont.

Bruce Elman in Edmonton

Beginning in July, I am leaving Edmonton and the University of Alberta to become the dean of law at the University of Windsor. This was a bittersweet decision. I am excited about my new position and enthusiastic about the challenges and possibilities that go with it. I am extremely sad, however, to be leaving my longtime colleagues, my close circle of wonderful friends, my synagogue, my Shabbat Minchah havurah, and my community. I am hopeful that in Windsor I will be able to, at least partially, fill the void left by these losses.

On June 15, the Jewish Federation of Edmonton held its annual general meeting. As part of the program, the federation extended its thanks to four individuals for their longtime service to the community. Without checking the records for the accuracy of this statement, I believe that those four individuals – Steven Mandel, Len Dolgoy, Valda Levin, and myself – were the last four presidents of the Federation and the last four chairs or co-chairs of the United Jewish Appeal campaign. With the exception of Valda who becomes the past-president (the most sought after position in any Jewish organization) of the federation, the rest of us are leaving the federation board.

As I watched the presentations, I reflected upon the extraordinary character and ability of these three individuals. They have truly made a difference to Jewish communal life in Edmonton. As I thought about it further, I realized that they are not the only individuals who give their time, expertise, or resources for the betterment of the community. There are literally hundreds of volunteers in this community – and I assume in all communities – who, motivated by nothing more than their desire to make their community a better place to live, work tirelessly on behalf of their shul, their JCC, their children's school or youth group, their parent's old age or nursing home, and the like.

We do not do enough to recognize the contributions of these volunteers. I want to make it clear that this does not include me. My accomplishments (quite minor in my estimation) have been recognized and celebrated by my community to an embarrassing extent. I have been honoured on a number of occasions, but the efforts of most volunteers go unrecognized.

Unlike me, very few volunteers have had the good fortune to be acknowledged for their efforts. All of these individuals – not merely a select few – are special and deserving of honour and recognition. Frankly, we often adopt the contrary attitude towards our leaders and volunteers. Rather than show our appreciation to those who work for the maintenance and improvement of our community, we seem to revel in criticizing their efforts and denigrating their commitment. On all measures of ethics and morality, this is simply wrong!

A final observation: As someone who, in spite of my impending move, has, and always will have, a deep affection for the Edmonton Jewish community, I was thrilled to see a whole cadre of new leaders – both young and older – join the federation board. Under the direction of the president-to-be, Alvin Goldsman, and our new UJA chair, Ram Romanowsky, these individuals are now charged with the responsibility of ensuring the continued viability and vibrancy of the Edmonton Jewish community. I know the community is in good hands.

Coincidentally, this week we studied a passage in Pirkei Avot which (according to Rabbi Reuven Bulka) speaks of community leadership renewal: "Rabbi Yishmael says: Be compliant with your leaders, be pleasant with your youth, greet everyone in a cheerful manner." (3:16)

My hope for Edmonton is that, as a community, we can practice respect for our leaders, be pleasant with our young leadership, and develop a community that happily works for the betterment of Klal Israel.

Bruce Elman is Belzberg professor of constitutional law at the University of Alberta. On July 1, he becomes dean of law at the University of Windsor.

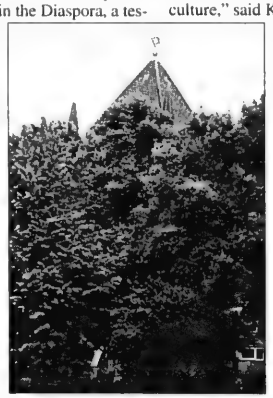
Ambivalence besets Jews in Germany

From the vantage point of a leafy park in central Cologne, the gray shingled roof of the Roonstrasse synagogue rises majestically above a grove of mature trees, revealing a plain Star of David piercing the sky. It is the only shul in this city not to have been destroyed by the Nazis during Kristallnacht, the 1938 nationwide pogrom which devastated Germany's Jewish community and set the stage for the Holocaust.

Sheldon Kirshner in Germany

In symbolic terms, the sight of a Magen David affixed to the spire of this imposing shul, a blend of Romanesque Revival and Moorish design, is revealing. Fifty five years after the collapse of the Nazi regime, Jews in Germany have risen again in a remarkable comeback.

In 1945, after his liberation from the Theresienstadt concentration camp, Rabbi Leo Baeck, a revered figure in German Jewry, declared, "The era of Jews in Germany is finished forever." But five decades on, reinforced by an influx of tens of thousands of Jews from the former Soviet Union, Germany is home to the third largest community in western Europe and the fastest growing one in the Diaspora, a testament to the Jewish spirit of resiliency and Germany's transformation into a democratic, prosperous state.



Cologne's Roonstrasse synagogue [Sheldon Kirshner photos]

By all accounts, there are 80,000 registered and an estimated 20,000 unregistered Jews in Germany today, scattered throughout 80 communities from Frankfurt to Hamburg and from Stuttgart to Halle. On the eve of Germany's reunification in 1990, the figure was about 30,000, consisting mainly of eastern European Jewish Holocaust survivors. It was an aging, declining community with a somewhat uncertain future. "People were sitting on their suitcases," said Salomon Korn, 56, the scion of Polish Jews, as well as the president of Frankfurt's community. "They postponed their emigration."

Moishe Waks, 47, tells a similar story. "We intended to leave Germany," explained Waks, a property manager and vice-president of Berlin's community who was born in a displaced persons camp in Fohrenwald. But, as in the case of many others who were stranded here after World War II, a combination of personal and economic circumstances kept them in Germany.

"We never imagined we would stay on," said Charlotte Knobloch, Munich's communal leader. Now 67, she has lived in Germany all her life. Hidden by a German farmer during the darkest days of the Nazi tyranny, she intended to settle in the United States. "We wanted to get away. No one thought Jews had a future in Germany." But after three pregnancies, she changed her mind, and settled in.

It is a truism that Jews live in Germany with a gnawing sense of guilt, even of angst. Although they have set down roots, they have definitely not reconciled themselves, psychologically at least, to living permanently in Germany. "I feel at home in the German language and culture," said Korn, an architect whose wife was born in the Warsaw ghetto. "But I don't regard Germany as my homeland. After the Holocaust, I would never admit to being a German."

Charlotte Knobloch

Instead, the vast majority of Jews consider themselves "Jews in Germany" rather than "German Jews," a definition which underscores an abiding alienation. "There is a sense of feeling different," said 36-year-old Michael Brenner, who teaches Jewish studies at Ludwig Maximilians University in Munich. By the same token, this is no longer a transitional "liquidation" community. "Jews are buying property and putting their trust in bricks and mortar," said Rabbi Walter Rothschild of Berlin, who spoke of a flowering of Jewish culture in Germany.

And yet, as Michael Wolffsohn – a historian at the German Armed Forces University in Munich – acknowledged, Jews in contemporary Germany are consumed by a deep ambivalence. A self-styled German patriot whose parents returned to Germany to reclaim expropriated property, he said, "It's a crime to live in a society with which you can't identify. If I felt this is a hostile place, I would have left. As soon as we're German citizens, we're Germans, full stop. If we define ourselves, objectively, as non-Germans, we're conveying the wrong impression to Germans." In this connection, he feels betrayed by Ignatz Bubis' decision to be buried in Israel rather than in Germany. Bubis, the former chair of the Central Council of Jews in Germany, died last August after seven years at the helm.

Born in Palestine, and a soldier in the Israeli army from 1967 to 1970, he readily concedes that his views are unrepresentative. But Wolffsohn, 53, is a member of a minuscule minority in more ways than one. In a community composed primarily of Jews of non-German origin, he is heir to a tradition almost eradicated by Adolf Hitler. It is a tradition which reached its apotheosis during the Weimar Republic, when roughly 600,000 Jews, many thoroughly assimilated, resided in Germany.

By sharp contrast, 70 percent of Germany's Jewish population today consists of former Soviet Jews, most of whom are detached from their Jewish background. "The central problem we face now as a community is how to absorb these Russian Jews," noted Waks, whose parents hail from Lodz, Poland. In addition, the community is short of teachers, rabbis and cantors. "It's hard to convince a rabbi to come to Germany," said an informant who preferred not to be identified. "For instance, it took more than two years to fill a rabbinical position in Berlin." And, he added, the general level of Jewish knowledge remains abysmal.

Nevertheless, the community is currently experiencing something of a cultural renaissance, as new schools, clubs, institutions, cafes, book shops and summer camps open to serve a growing population. But, as Knobloch warned, a shortage of funds for infrastructure projects is hampering development.

Torn by serious divisions and rivalries, this is a nominally Orthodox community. However, it is gradually becoming more religiously pluralistic, said Toby Axelrod, assistant director of the American Jewish Committee office in Berlin. Liberal Judaism is making inroads, a congregation in Oldenburg employs a female rabbi, and the Berlin community has decided in principle to hire Germany's first woman cantor after she completes her studies abroad.

Rabbi Walter Rothschild

The community, too, is on the cusp of a major intergenerational transformation, as Rabbi Rothschild observed. The post-war survivors are passing from the scene and being replaced by a generation more, though not completely, at ease in Germany. Apart from Waks, two such persons are his boss, Andreas Nahama, a history professor whose recently deceased father was a cantor; and Georg Heuberger, the director of Frankfurt's Jewish Museum.

Fairly typical of the second Jewish generation, Waks, Nahama and Heuberger appear comfortable as Jews in Germany (where the intermarriage rate surpasses the 50 percent mark, even though most Germans will never meet a Jew). Jews like them are reasonably integrated into German society, and do not view anti-Semitism, such as it is, as a day-to-day problem. But in the shadow of the Holocaust, Jews have yet to reach a state of normality.

"I'm afraid of blunt philo-Semitism or blunt anti-Semitism," said Esther Kontarsky, a 31-year-old Berlin translator. "It's difficult to lead a normal life here." Her acquaintance, Bernard Lerner, 43, though worried about Germany's xenophobic streak, which usually expresses itself in neo-Nazi attacks against visible minorities, is more optimistic. "Germany," he said, " is a democratic nation where Jews can lead secure lives, as in any other European country."

Parshat Shlach

Rabbinic Reflections

By RABBI MENDEL KAPLAN

And HaShem spoke to Moshe, saying, "Send, for yourself, men, and have them scout the land of Canaan." Twelve individuals noted for their piety, propriety and prominence were dispatched by Moshe Rabbeinu.

Forty days later they returned. After delivering a glowing description of Eretz Yisrael they stated, "mighty are those who inhabit the land, and the cities are greatly fortified." They then concluded, "We are unable to go up against the nation for they are more powerful then we are."

The reaction of the people is swift and unequivocal, "would we have died in the land of Egypt ... why does HaShem bring us into this land to fall by the sword ... let us return to Egypt."

Initially, God's response is that the Jewish people are deserving of annihilation. Only with Moshe's intercession does God relent, vowing however, that this generation will not enter the Promised Land. For forty years they will bear their iniquity, as they wander in the barren desert.

The entire episode seems enigmatic. Why does God allow Moshe to send the spies? Having been sent, what is the parameter of their sin, their report is seemingly entirely truthful!

The celebrated Lubavicher Rebbe of sainted memory (whose sixth yahrzeit will be marked this Thursday) once explained; God created a world in which nature reigns supreme. God doesn't perform unnecessary miracles; we may not depend on dismemberment of the nature's law and order for success. Accordingly, spies must be sent to ascertain the most effective route military conquest need take.

However, depending entirely on our own efforts and the framework of nature is equally unacceptable. To assume that the key of achievement rests solely in our own hands is a serious error. Instead, we must view our handiwork as a vehicle for the manifestation of the Divine blessing. Simply stated, we must do our best and trust that God will crown our efforts with success.

The wayward spies reported truthfully about the strength of the Canaanites and their powerfully fortified dwellings. However, they committed a cardinal crime by drawing their own conclusions about the chances of a successful invasion. The question never was if, the question was how.

The modern message of this ancient story reverberates with great force today. A short half-century ago, prophets of doom predicted the demise of traditional Judaism by the end of the millennium. But that was never our question. Although North American soil didn't seem that fertile for the replanting of Torah Judaism, visionaries like our beloved Rebbe only pondered how, not if Yiddishkeit would prosper.

When the Rebbe talked about reaching out and educating Jews immersed in the secular society, most people laughed saying it couldn't be done. The bridge was too wide, the gap too vast. Instead of being fazed, he set in motion the most powerful wave of return our people has ever seen.

And today nobody is laughing. Instead, everyone has embraced his holistic and loving philosophy of caring and sharing. Because the question never was if Torah could survive in the new world, only how long it would take. So take heart, a messianic universe of peace and prosperity is on the way, the question is only when.

Is Smoking Kosher?

Comparative Law

According to Health Canada, Canadians will suffer 46,910 deaths attributable to smoking in the year 2000. Studies have linked smoking to a variety of illnesses, including heart disease, lung cancer, emphysema, and bronchial disorders. The health risks smoking presents pose a halachic question – does Halachah permit smoking?

In Judaism, health is a religious concern. Maimonides notes that a sound mind requires a sound body, and for this reason it is a religious obligation to take care of one's health (Hilchas Deot 4:1).

There are many halachic regulations enacted for health purposes (see Shulchan Aruch YD 116). In general, health regulations are treated with greater stringency than any other section of Halachah (Hullin 9b).

While health and safety are halachic obligations, it does not mean that every health and safety risk are prohibited. It is normal for people to accept certain safety risks in the course of their regular activities. Regular activities such as driving, flying in a plane or giving birth to a child entail some risk. What needs to be determined is which risks are considered to be halachically acceptable and which are not.

The crucial text for determining the criteria of acceptable risk is found in Yebamot 72a. The Talmud states in the name of Rav Papa that even though there is an obligation to avoid danger, when many people ignore a specific type of health hazard, it is halachically permitted to ignore it because "the Lord watches the simple" (Psalms 116:6).

There are several interpretations of Rav Papa's statement. To some, this means that even a demonstrated health hazard may be ignored if most people ignore it as well (Ritva s.v. "Shomer").

This interpretation sees acceptable risk as subjective and socially determined; I cannot be more reckless than most other people in my society. One can conclude that according to this view, if large groups of people ignore the health risks of smoking, it is not halachically prohibited.

A different interpretation is offered by Rabbi Yaakov Etlinger (Binyan Zion 137). He explains that there is a difference between behaviour that presents an immediate danger, and behaviour that may present a future danger. An action that presents immediate danger, such as entering a burning building, is prohibited. Something that may turn dangerous in the future, such as a long boat trip, is allowed because "the Lord watches the simple."

Some argue that according to Etlinger's opinion, smoking, which does not present immediate danger to the smoker, would be permitted.

Others take a different view of the text. They say the dispensation of "the Lord watches the simple" only refers to cases where the danger is extremely small (Achiezer 1:23:2) or cases where the danger is "well known," but there is no empirical, scientific evidence to substantiate it (Tzitz Eliezer 15:39; cf. Beit Yoseph YD 262).

According to this interpretation, any scientifically demonstrated health hazard is absolutely prohibited. Because of this, Rabbi Eliezer Waldenberg prohibited smoking, saying that there is unambiguous scientific evidence that cigarette smoking is dangerous. Rabbi Waldenberg says those who do smoke must make every effort to quit smoking.

More controversial is the view of Rabbi Moshe Feinstein (Iggrot CM II:76; dated June 10, 1981). While Rabbi Feinstein strongly discourages smoking, he writes that since many people who smoke do not suffer any health problems, and most who smoke are not endangered by it, one may say that smoking is permitted because "the Lord watches the simple."

Due to Rabbi Feinstein's authority, many rabbis are loath to prohibit smoking. However, a recent ruling by the Rabbinical Council of America (available at: http://www.rabbis.org/ publications/smoking.pdf) which Rabbi Feinstein's son-in-law, Rabbi Moshe Tendler, co-authored, argues that in light of recent studies demonstrating the widespread danger cigarette smoking presents, and the fact that there are considerably fewer smokers today, Rabbi Feinstein would today reverse his position and prohibit smoking.

Like many questions in Halachah, there is more than one opinion about whether smoking is permitted or prohibited. However, all authorities agree that taking good care of one's health is an important religious value, and may not be overlooked.

Are religious cults dangerous?

Mystics and Messiahs – Cults and New Religions in American History* by Philip Jenkins, Oxford University Press, $44.00.

Books
Bernard Baskin

Are religious cults dangerous? Do they engender mass suicides, doomsday fears and sexual abuse? Do they engage in brainwashing and mind-control? Do they prey on the young and uninformed?

Should Jews be concerned? Estimates vary widely, but polls indicate that perhaps 20 percent of Hare Krishnas are Jewish, and that Jews constitute as much as 30 percent of the Divine Light Mission membership. There are also many Jews involved in scientology.

"Jews for Jesus" which proclaims Jesus as messiah while retaining Jewish customs and rituals, has been particularly condemned by Jewish organizations.

The overall threat to Judaism by cults is probably exaggerated. Surveys of rabbis find little evidence of widespread defections or conversions, but the cult issue does focus attention on what many Jewish spokespeople feel is an ongoing threat to Jewish well-being – if only a minor one.

Cults themselves often suffer from wild, unfounded accusations including ritual murder, as well as bizarre rites and rituals. The author reports that the media discovered the phrase "ritual murder" in 1913, while reporting anti-Semitic trials in Czarist Russia. Over the next decade or so, the term exclusively implied a Jewish context.

Human sacrifice tales revived in the early 1930s during an upsurge of popular anti-Semitism, at a time when Americans feared the renewal of mass Jewish immigration. For the fascist right wing, the Lindberg baby murder of 1932 was certainly a Jewish ritual murder, supposedly carried out at the Feast of Purim (sic).

Philip Jenkins, professor of history and religious studies at Penn State University, argues that what we label as cults are often nothing more than the beginning of new religious thinking or organizations which are significant social and cultural contributors to the healthy development of society. Present-day groups should be seen in historical perspective because they have their core beliefs rooted in 19th- or early-20th-century movements.

These new beliefs develop because the needs of people are not being satisfied by the established churches. The religious mainstream reject the new groups because of their own fears of the new, of the other, and of competition.

Jenkins points to the astounding growth in size and respectability of such sects as the Church of Latter-day Saints (Mormons), Baptists, and Pentecostals – all of whom were considered insidious in their early years but are now mainstream religions.

Without denying that many new religious groups have engaged in morally suspect or legally questionable activities, Jenkins maintains that these have been a small minority.

Some religious traditions – once vehemently condemned – have grown both in numbers and social acceptance in recent times. An example has been the expansion of American Islam since the 1960s, to the extent that there will be more Muslims than Jews in the United States within a decade or so (in this case, much of the growth is attributable to immigration rather than domestic conversions).

Not long ago, Islam was regarded as a highly deviant belief-system for Americans, but today it is a well-established component of the religious scene.

The modern story of American Buddhism is quite as impressive. A century or so can make all the difference between renegade status and widespread acceptance.

Mystics and Messiahs deals with an astonishing variety of cults and imparts interesting and little-known information about them. Scholarly, but always lucid and readable, this engaging description of recent American religious history is essentially the story of how once marginalized groups eventually found a respectable place in the religious establishment.

Jewish genetic disorders

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

Over the past couple of weeks, we have looked at information about Jewish genetic disorders on the Internet. While the Internet may be the best place to find that information, it is important to remember that the Internet should not be considered a substitute for trusted medical advice.

The best place to start is at the National Foundation for Jewish Genetic Diseases Web site [http://www.nfjgd.org/]. The foundation supplies online information and weblinks about the genetic diseases more common among Jews such as Bloom's syndrome, canavan disease, familial dysautonomia, fanconia anemia, Gaucher's disease, mucolipidosis IV, Niemann Pick disease, Tay-Sachs disease and torsion dystonia.

For a good explanation of how diseases are inherited, I recommend the Albert Einstein Healthcare Network Web site [http://www.einstein.edu/jewishgenetics/].

Less well-known is a connection between schizophrenia and the Jewish community [http://www.med.jhu.edu/epigen/ashkenazim.htm]. The Johns Hopkins University School of Medicine wants to identify the susceptibility to schizophrenia among Ashkenazi Jews and develop new treatment.

Why study Ashkenazim? The site explains that "Jewish individuals are in a unique position to assist scientists in the understanding of genetic disorders. Due to a long history of marriage within the faith that extends back thousands of years, the Jewish community has emerged from a limited number of ancestors and has a similar genetic makeup. This allows researchers to more easily perform genetic studies and locate disease causing genes."

The site explains that the risks for schizophrenia and bipolar disorder seem to be about 1 percent for any population. Some studies have suggested an increased risk in the Jewish population but those studies have been inadequately substantiated at this time.

Research is also being done into a recessive gene found in Ashkenazi Jews which is likely to be a source of hereditary deafness [http://jewishaz.com/1998b/981127/deafness.shtml]. Researchers stress that the frequency of deafness is not higher in the Jewish population. Bronya Keats, director of the Molecular and Human Genetic Centre at the Louisiana State University Medical Centre points out, "It's just that in the (Ashkenazi) Jewish population, many profound hearing impairments are due to a certain gene mutation."

Among Sephardi Jews, research is continuing into familial Mediterranean fever [http://www.acponline.org/journals/annals/01oct98/medfever.htm].

FMF is a recessively inherited disorder characterized by episodes of fever with abdominal pain, pleurisy, or arthritis that affects Sephardi Jews, Turks, Armenians and Arabs. I particularly like the Bnai Sepharad FMF site [http://members.tripod.com/BnaiSepharad/] because it is a grassroots effort. There are messages from people in Amsterdam, Turkey, Italy, Kuwait, Las Vegas, Cape Town, Stockholm and Israel – all sharing questions, concerns and expertise about a relatively rare disorder.

Another excellent way to learn more about rare Jewish diseases is to meet others who are facing similar challenges. You can join that worldwide community through e-mail lists such as the genetic disease listserv [http://sargon.mmu.ac.uk/genetic.htm] and the Genetic Disease E-mail Discussion List [http://www.gaucherdisease.org/list.htm]. You must supply your name to join the discussion list but that information will be kept confidential.

Hopefully, the silent genetic links that join people from around the world will now be better understood thanks to links created by the Internet.

Rabbi Shimon Aisenbach (right), director of Canadian Friends of Cuban Jewry, in Havana with a member of Cuba's 1,000-member Jewish community.

Friends reach out to Cuban Jews

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Among the Toronto Jewish community's plethora of "Friends of" groups is one that brings direct aid and comfort to Jews in one of the world's last Communist bastions.

Set up here nearly a year ago, the Canadian Friends of Cuban Jewry (CFCJ) has an ambitious mandate: to raise the spirits of Cuba's remaining 1,000 Jews, in a time marked by economic hardship and political uncertainty.

Actually, the Canadian Friends have been around since 1993, with a branch in Montreal, which itself was an outgrowth of the New York-based Chabad Friends of Cuban Jewry.

Over the past six years, the CFCJ has visited Cuba 56 times, coinciding with Jewish holidays. In the spirit of Chabad's aggressive style of outreach, the group not only brings tons of kosher foodstuffs, but also tfillin, prayer books and mezuzot – all designed, as director Rabbi Shimon Aisenbach says, to reinforce Yiddishkeit in a place that has been officially atheist for 40 years.

While anti-Semitism is virtually unknown in Cuba, members of the Jewish community are subject to the same hardships as other Cubans, says Rabbi Aisenbach.

"They're going through a difficult time, together with everyone else. Remember, [Cuba] used to get billions of dollars from the Soviet Union. Now, everything is rationed."

Rabbi Aisenbach himself has been to the island a dozen times, most recently on Shavuot, when Spanish-speaking Chabad shlichim (emissaries) brought over 1,000 cheese blintzes and other traditional holiday food.

The Friends' work is not to be confused with the efforts of the Ontario region of Canadian Jewish Congress, which has been shipping Passover foods and supplies to Cuba for 30 years.

This past spring, for the first time, the Cuban government itself aided CJC's campaign. Cubana, the state-owned airline, agreed to ship 4,000 kilos of kosher-for-Passover matzah, wine and canned goods free of charge, and another 6,000 at a greatly reduced rate.

Passover was also a busy time for the CFCJ. Shlichim made sure every family received matzah and wine. They also officiated at a huge public seder, at which shmurah matzah was distributed, as was a special edition Spanish Haggadah with explanations and illustrations. Chabad representatives went door to door throughout the holiday.

The Friends also run a Jewish summer camp for children and to date, have arranged with the government to allow six young men to study at foreign yeshivot, mainly in Argentina. Of the six, three have gotten married to Jewish women.

From Canada, Chabad emissaries travel to Cuba in pairs, helping to affix mezuzot to over 170 homes so far, and aiding in the increasing number of circumcisions being performed, including on older boys.

But problems remain, says Rabbi Aisenbach. Kashrut is one, as there is no full time shochet. (One is brought in periodically.) The government, Rabbi Aisenbach notes, has allocated a number of cattle to the Jewish community.

Havana's relations with Israel are officially non-existent, but the Jewish population seems hungry for spiritual renewal, Rabbi Aisenbach observes. Services at the capital's main synagogue, the Adath Israel, are well-attended.

People eagerly snap up the many colorful explanatory brochures the Friends produce, and avail themselves of the three small libraries Chabad has founded where Jews can learn about their heritage.

Next on the Jewish calendar are the High Holidays and the Friends are already making plans to deliver lulavim and etrogim for Sukkot.

The group also provides ongoing humanitarian aid, shipping shoes, clothes and medicine to the community. It relies solely on donations.

For details, call the Friends at 905-707-6452.

Making Holocaust studies relevant to students

By ADAM SEGAL
CJN Intern

TORONTO — All eyes in the classroom are focused on the television screen as the video tape of Adolph Eichmann's 1961 testimony in Jerusalem is being played.

"He knew what he was doing," explains Jessica Myers, reacting angrily to Eichmann's excuse that he was just following orders when he arranged for the transport of millions of Jews to death camps.

Lewis Fried, the teacher, says that these are the types of responses students have presented during the year-long Twentieth Century Holocaust Studies course at Thornhill Secondary School, one of three Ontario public high schools offering a Holocaust course.

There is an estimated Jewish student population of 65 percent at Thornhill and Fried says that has kept enrollment in the course high since its inception in the early '90s.

"We underestimate kids' desire to engage in discussions on racism…morality and human nature. [This course] gives them a place to do that," Fried says.

Saul Bancroft, a student in the class, says it may be even more useful for non-Jewish students to take this course. "People who don't know about the Holocaust are the ones who should be taking this course," he says.

But Fried says attracting non-Jewish students to the course is difficult.

"When a lot of non-Jewish kids see the title Holocaust Studies, they decide not to take it because they see it as a Jewish course. That's a real problem in the public school system," he says, noting that Vaughan Secondary School and Westmount Collegiate Institute, the other schools with Holocaust courses, both have large Jewish populations.

"If we repackaged this [course], and called it Genocide in the Twentieth Century, I'm willing to bet we'd get…60 students signing up."

Heart of Darkness, Genocide in the Twentieth Century is the title of the Holocaust course offered at Vaughan Secondary School. Stephen Bloom, the teacher, says on average, non-Jewish enrolment in the course is only 10 to 15 percent.

In an effort to make the course relevant to everyone, Fried and Bloom both say that they refer to other genocides.

In Bloom's class, students must do an independent study project that is not on the Holocaust, but must be on another example of a genocide, such as in Rwanda or Bosnia-Herzegovina.

Unfortunately, Bloom says, "the perception is that…it is specifically angled at [Jewish] kids."

Bloom says occasionally the classroom environment has been tense because some non-Jewish students do not have the same sensibilities towards the Holocaust as Jewish students. He recalled this past semester,, a non-Jewish student who "asked questions that [may] have offended many kids. She said 'wasn't Hitler just being efficient or why didn't the Jews stand up for themselves?' "

The new curriculum, which entered Ontario high schools last September, does not offer a Holocaust specific course, but does outline several aspects of Holocaust education which must be addressed in grades 9/10 history, Grade 10 civics and Grade 12 world history.

For example, curriculum for Grade 10 history says students must "produce a timeline that charts and identifies significant historical events related to the Holocaust…such as anti-Semitism, the rise of Nazism, Kristallnacht, the establishment of ghettos…and death camps." How much time a teacher spends on this material is at their discretion.

Heather Henricks, a history teacher at Stouffville District Secondary School, a school with a tiny Jewish population, says she spends about five days on the Holocaust, as part the World War II unit in Grade 10 history.

But Fried says time constraints often limit how much time teachers can devote to the Holocaust. "It's generally rushed over in a day, maybe a day and a half," he says.

Jessica Melanson, one of two non-Jewish students in Fried's class said one of the reasons she took the Holocaust course was because of the lack of material in the Grade 10 history course.

"The Holocaust is always brushed over…[because] a lot of teachers dance around sensitive issues," she said. "Mr. Fried is not like that."

Fried said delving into disturbing aspects of the Holocaust is difficult for some students. On the first day of class, he shows a three-minute video of Auschwitz and invites students to speak with him individually if they feel the course may be too emotionally or academically intense for them to handle.

Fried and Bloom have found teaching the Holocaust course quite rewarding, but they may not have the opportunity to teach the course much longer. Students graduating in 2003 will have one less year of high school, which may result in the scrapping of optional courses currently offered, like the Holocaust.

Garfield Newman, a curriculum consultant with the York Region Board of Education says the only way to keep Holocaust courses around is for teachers, students and school administrators to "convince the ministry [of education] there is a specific local need." A petition would have to be submitted to the ministry to show there is a demand and need for the course.

Fried is worried that the ministry will not offer these kinds of courses, but he points out that the new textbooks for the Grade 10 history and civics courses have focused on the Holocaust as "the case study for human rights."

ganizations based in Canada received funds from Mazon in its latest round of allocations. The funds went to food banks, church and synagogue groups, summer camps and other relief programs.

In the past two years, Mazon has begun to fund community garden projects. Run by social service agencies and church groups, the program sets aside city and church land for communal gardens. Fruit and vegetables are planted in the spring and those in need benefit at the end of the growing season with fresh produce as well as food for preserves, Kott-Wolle said. Mazon funds the cost of the seeds and tools.

A second innovative project funded in part by Mazon is a "gleaning" program operated by the Jane and Finch Community Ministry, a church and community centre in Toronto. The program buses pregnant women to farmers' fields in York Region, north of Toronto, where they can pick fruits and vegetables. The program is geared towards providing pregnant women with their extra nutrition needs, Kott-Wolle said. Mazon funds the $1,520 transportation cost. Two thousand people are expected to benefit from this year's program.

Mazon has also allocated $3,000 to a Toronto street relief program run jointly by the Native Men's Residence and Ve'ahavta, a Jewish volunteer group.

The program provides food, clothing and personal hygiene items to between 250-300 street people each night.

Mazon also allocated $2,000 to the Canadian Red Cross for Ethiopian Famine Relief while in 1998, it transferred $6,441 – some of which was raised by the First Narayever Congregation in Toronto – for North Korean famine relief.

The vast majority of Mazon's allocations, however, are earmarked for Canadian groups, including the Saskatoon Food Bank ($2,000), Pantree of Life, Montreal ($4,000) and Bikur Cholim of Toronto ($6,000).

Kott-Wolle said Mazon has established a committee to discuss ways of increasing the organization's profile in Jewish communities outside Toronto and Montreal. Mazon will probably identify a target city, create a relationship with a group of volunteers and promote Mazon's work there, she said.

Mazon has also announced creation of the Dodo Heppner Volunteer Award of Excellence.

פֿון אַלעק סילווער

„יִדיש איז מײַן לשון" איז דאָס אויסגעפֿיר־לידּ פֿון דעם כאָר. עס איז פֿון א פֿאַעמע פֿון ז. ווייַנפֿער מיט מוזיק פֿון משה ראָוך. עס הייבט זיך אָן מיט: „לשון מײַן איז יִידיש / פּול מיט פּשטות / און רחבותדיק נגידיש, / וואָרעם ווי די זון. / המשך איז מײַן זכיה / קיום איז מײַן ליד, / מײַן געזאַנג עליה / צו דעם מענטש און יִיד. . .". מער ווי אַלע מאָל איז דאָס ליד פֿאַסיק היינטיקן יאָר, ווען יִידיש טאָראָנטאָ און אַנדערע יִידישע ישובים וועלן אָפּפֿייַערן „1000 יאָר יִידיש". דער „מאָראָנטער יִידישער פֿאָלקס כאָר" קען זיך שטאָלץ מיט זייער חלק, וואָס זיי האָבן צוגעמראָגן צום אינפֿאָרמאַלן דאָס יִידישע לשון.

צוריקגייענדיק צום „טאָראָנטער יִדישן פֿאָלקס כאָר" איז טאַקע אמת, אַז זיי זינגען נישט בלויז אין יִידיש, נאָר אויך אין העברעיִש, ענגליש, פֿראַנצויזיש אַן אפֿשר נאָך אין אַנדערע שפּראַכן. דאָס באָוויזט די פֿאַר־שידנארטקייט פֿון כאָר. דאָך ווען מען גיט א קוק אויף די לידער, וואָס זיי האָבן געזונגען בײַם לעצטן קאָנצערט, וי אויך בײַ אַנדערע קאָנצערטן, זעט מען, אַז זיי זינגען אַלע „יִדיש". פֿון „דאָס גזאַנג פֿון יִידישע שקלאַפֿן" פֿון ווערדיס אָפּערע; „גיך אַהיים" פֿון דוראַראָקס סימ־פֿאָניע „פֿון א נייער וועלט"; „א היפּן צו פּריהיים" פֿון באָוסטאָן קאָנצערט מחיקער אסקאר פּעטערסאָן; בײַ צו „ראָשיתקעס מיט מאָנדלעך" פֿון אברהם גאָלדפֿאַדן, זינגען דאָס לידער פֿון האָפּענונג, ארבעט, פּריהיים, שלום אַן אַזאָלן ישׂו. דאָס זינגען די טרימפּע אַן פֿאַראַנגען פֿון יִידישן פֿאָלק אויף זיין לאַנגן גלות־וועג.

חשובע לייַנערס, צום טוף א פֿראָגע: צו וועמ איך געווען בײַם לעצטן קאָנצערט? אויב יאָ, האָט איך זיכער נעמאָט פֿאַרגעסן. אויב נישט, איז א שאַד. איך האָט דוד־כּבֿוד־לאָזט א גוטע געלעגנהייט צו פֿאַרברענגן א שיינעם נאָכמיטאָג מיט א יִדישן כאָר, וואָס זינגט שוין 75 יאָר בי אונדז אין שטאָט. מאַכט זיכער, אַז איר האָט בילעטן פֿאַרן קומעדיקן יאָר. דער „טאָראָנטער יִדישער פֿאָלקס כאָר" איז ווערט מען זאָל אים הערן אַן אונ־טערשטיצן. דעם כאָר וויטשט מיר נאָך לאַנגע, שפּעדישע יאָרן.

Investors get chance to participate in Israeli economy

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Canadian investors have the opportunity to participate in the Israeli economy as individual investors, says Paul Morton, chair of the Canada-Israel Opportunity Funds.

The Funds, formed in 1995, established three limited partnerships which are now valued at more that $45 million.

Morton says that the Funds' Israeli investment managers, Shrem, Fudim, Kelner & Co. Ltd. (SFK), have provided Canadian investors with some of the best returns in Israel's high-tech market.

SFK, one of Israel's leading independent investment and merchant banking groups, also engages in direct investment funds management, consultancy and portfolio management, management of mutual funds and venture capital funds, and the underwriting and management of public offerings.

Morton said that to date, Fund 1 (the first limited partnership), has produced increases in assets of more than 400 percent, and Fund 2 has produced increases of 300 percent.

Fund 1 is in the midst of realizing on its investment and has returned in excess of investors' original investments. Fund 2 has returned 40 percent of investors' capital and is expected to return the balance in the next several months.

Paul Morton

Itschak Shrem, chair of SFK, says that "With the success of Funds 1 and 2, it was appropriate to offer our investors another vehicle for continuing their investment."

Morton recently announced that Fund 3 Limited Partnership has raised $13 million to date.

"We are pleased with the continued support of both our company and the Israeli high-tech industry and economy," says Shrem. "We are also pleased that many of the earlier investors have increased their investment commitments and that several new investors have come on board."

Morton attributes the success of the Funds to SFK's ability to invest at early stages in companies.

"Usually, direct investments in private companies are reserved for institutional investors. However, through our relationship with SFK, we have been able to offer the same investment opportunities to our Canadian investors. Many of them count our Funds as their most successful investment to date."

Morton adds that the Funds also invest, to a lesser extent, in publicly traded Israeli companies listed on both the Israeli and U.S. stock exchanges.

The Canada-Israel Opportunity Fund 111, says Morton, will remain open to investors for the next several months on a limited basis.

Investors in the Canada-Israel Opportunity Funds come from across Canada. The Funds hold annual conferences in either Toronto or Israel.

They are in the process of creating their own Web site which will highlight their investments and other related items.

Family gathers for 55th reunion

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO —The ruach and camaraderie at the Rose family gatherings would have made Beryl and Mintzi proud.

Beryl Rose formed the Rose Family Club before his death in 1945. He told his family it was so that "cousins won't pass in the street and not know each other."

Beryl and Mintzi Rose (Temnograd) taken in 1928.

Recently, more than 130 members of the Rose family, some fourth and fifth generation, gathered in Toronto for the family's 55th anniversary reunion weekend.

"One special element that adds meaning to our reunion," says Sara Belmont, a fourth-generation member of the planning committee, "is that it was planned primarily by fourth-generation Roses. This is a large step toward ensuring the continuation of the Rose Family Club, its history and tradition."

The clan is now 13 branches strong. When the family members gathered at the Borochov Centre for a banquet and other activities, they recalled the lives of Russian-born Beryl and Mintzi, whose name was Temnograd. The name was changed by an immigration officer in Halifax in 1922, who wanted to give them "a good honest name." So he gave them his own name – Rose.

The Masters of Ceremony, fourth-generation Brian Belmont and Lisa Rodin-Gardner made their entrances dressed as their great-grandparents in period dress.

Third-generation Anna Mae Belmont and Sippy Rodin, also dressed as Beryl and Mintzi, performed a skit reflecting the family history.

A book, titled MGM II (My Guntze Mishpocha), an update to the first MGM published five years ago for the family's golden anniversary reunion, was distributed.

The book contains an article titled, The Early Years of the Rose Family as told by the late Bella Rose Marcus in an interview with her daughter Joyce Mundel. There are photos, stories, thoughts, and reminiscences dating back to 1861, as well as current family addresses.

Participants also came from the United States, including California, Connecticut and Texas.

"We look forward to celebrating our 60th anniversary," Sara told The CJN.

"It was a great opportunity for cousins

Northern Israeli kids get chance at 'normalcy'

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — From the vantage point of his northern Israeli town bordering south Lebanon, Tel Aviv seems as though it's in another country entirely, according to the former mayor of Metulla.

Yossi Goldberg

Yossi Goldberg, 58, expects about 1,000 families from northern Israel to leave the area permanently this summer, following Israel's withdrawal from South Lebanon, he said on a recent visit here, speaking to staff members at UJA FEDERATION.

"Some mothers ask, 'How can I not give my kids [the opportunity] to grow as normal kids in Haifa, Tel Aviv or Jerusalem?'" he said

Goldberg's priority now is to offer normalcy to youngsters and families of northern Israel.

Metulla's Canada Centre – a UIA Federations Canada-funded sports and recreation facility which Goldberg serves as chairman of the board of governors – plans to host 30,000 children from the region on their summer vacation this year.

"With your special project, you change completely life in the north," he said. When taking part in Canada Centre activities like hockey or swimming, kids "feel they are in Miami Beach or Toronto – but through the window you can watch the Hezbollah attack."

Goldberg intends to stay in Metulla. He believes there will be peace, but achieving it "will be a matter of some years."

His wife Galia, who accompanied him, told The CJN she remembers thinking, when their son was born 26 years ago, that he would not have to fight in the army. She also recalled lying on top of their three children (now university students in Jerusalem) "many times" to protect them during Katyusha attacks.

Life was not always stressful in Metulla, noted her husband in his talk. His paternal grandfather was one of the early settlers of the town, which was founded in 1896. At that time, during the Ottoman Empire, there was "not any border, not any problems, not any conflict," said Goldberg.

Despite border conflict in recent years, there were "many years" of co-operation with the Lebanese, he said.

Following Israel's withdrawal from South Lebanon, Metulla residents became directly involved with Lebanese refugees. A neighbour stayed at Goldberg's home overnight, turning his own house over to 40 of the 6,000 South Lebanese refugees, he said.

Until recently, it was "no big deal" to cross the border into Lebanon, said Goldberg. But now the border's Good Fence has become an off-limits army zone and the former South Lebanese security zone has become Hezbollah land, he said.

Goldberg expects attacks on northern Israel to continue for a number of months. Speaking days before Syrian president Hafez Assad's death, Goldberg said the key to peace is an understanding with Syria.

Northern Israelis will not be pushed out of the area, he said. "We will protect the border, and we will build a normal life under the conditions we have."

CHAT expanding into Richmond Hill

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — To paraphrase a well-known slogan, "Go north young man [and woman]!"

The Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto (CHAT) announced this week that, in partnership with UJA FEDERATION, it is leasing the former Richmond Hill High School as a second campus.

Some 200 students who live north of Steeles, about half of the incoming Grade 9 students, will be what headmaster Paul Shaviv called in a press release "the pioneering founding grade."

For the first year, they will be bused at no charge from Thornhill.

The school will eventually house all grades.

Richmond Hill High School, on Wright Street between Bathurst and Yonge, a little north of Major Mackenzie, has a capacity of 700 students. It was closed as a cost-cutting measure by the York Region Board of Education this month.

The release said that the board of CHAT had decided to establish a second campus as part of the Jewish community's new York region expansion project, but needs an interim location to help alleviate overcrowding at the Wilmington campus.

CHAT president, Baila Lubek said in the release that the new location will permit "a grade of comfortable size, but still large enough to generate a great social milieu," access to a fully equipped building, including a gym and field, and "full administration and support services."

Students will have their own extra-curricular programs, but will also be able to join their Wilmington classmates in "appropriate events and activities."

Full story next week.

Waterloo U gets Jewish studies chairholder

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

The University of Waterloo has named its first chairholder and professor of Jewish studies.

The appointee, James (Jim) Diamond, is a lawyer and the son of Holocaust survivors.

A 1978 graduate of Osgoode Hall Law School, Diamond is a specialist on the philosopher Moses Maimonides and on Jewish biblical interpretation during the medieval period.

He has published in various scholarly journals, and is looking forward to taking up his position at Waterloo, Ontario's fourth largest university, in September.

"It affords me the rare opportunity of conveying the beauty of the rich Jewish intellectual traditions to others of all backgrounds in an academic setting and in a particularly vibrant campus," he said.

Paul Socken, a professor of French at Waterloo who helped start the Jewish studies program, said great things are expected of Diamond.

"His profound religious background, as well as his academic credentials in history and philosophy, make him uniquely qualified to teach Jewish studies as a chaired professor at a major Canadian university."

Diamond will teach a variety of courses, ranging from medieval Jewish philosophy to a thematic introduction of the Bible.

Socken said that the courses will also appeal to students who have no background in Jewish studies.

Born and raised in Toronto, Diamond, 47, attended Eitz Chaim and Ner Israel Yeshiva. In Jerusalem, he studied at Bet Hatalmud Yeshiva. Subsequently, he attended the University of Toronto, Osgoode Hall and New York University's law school.

Diamond said his parents, who hail from Eastern Europe, have had an enormous influence on him.

"My inspiration has always been the strength shown by my parents' generation in not allowing themselves to succumb to hopelessness and despair and in overcoming the horrors of the radical evil perpetrated against them," he explained.

"They passed on to me a solid Jewish education and a Judaism that is not marked by victimization, but rather one that has contributed a profound intellectual and spiritual ethos to mankind."

Diamond practised law for some 20 years, but was always fascinated by the Jewish literary tradition.

"There was never a 'switch' to Jewish studies, just a natural transition into an area I felt most at home," he observed.

Diamond said his scholarly career really began when he won first prize in the Bora Laskin Competition on Jewish Law while attending law school in Toronto.

"Laskin's congratulatory note inspired me to continue with scholarly pursuits."

He and his wife, Florence, have three children.

The University of Waterloo decided to establish a Jewish studies program after the dean of the faculty of arts, Brian Hendley, saw the movie Schindler's List.

"He was so moved by it that he asked me to start the program," said Socken.

The university has raised $1.5 million toward a $2 million endowment for a chair in Jewish studies. It will be named after Joe Lebovic, a Toronto businessman and major donor, and his brother.

Socken said the Jewish studies program is a major development at Waterloo, which is known for its courses in technology, but whose arts faculty is still the biggest one on campus.

Bar-Ilan launches fellowship program

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — After nine years as national president of Canadian Friends of Bar-Ilan University, Phil Schwartz is stepping down.

The Toronto private investment banker was honoured recently by the organization at a tribute brunch held at the Village Shul; at the same time, a new fellowship program was established at the university.

The Canadian Doctoral Fellowship of Excellence program will fund three PhD students, one each in the fields of humanities, social sciences and Jewish studies. Each of the three fellowships is worth about $54,000 Canadian.

The qualifying students are obligated to complete their doctorates within four years, said Canadian Friends' national executive director Jerry Tollinsky. Fellows have not yet been named, he added.

The fellowship was an "excellent" idea, said Schwartz, crediting the committee that planned his tribute.

At the event, he spoke about issues of tolerance, democracy and working together.

"I'm very much a believer in the bringing together of science and religion, and I'm very much a believer in tolerance and working with all kinds of Jews. That's what Bar-Ilan stands for," Schwartz told The CJN.

The university, which was founded in 1955 and serves over 26,000 students, "by its definition" focuses on building bridges between religious and non-religious students, said Schwartz.

An alumnus of the University of Toronto and Osgoode Hall, where he obtained his LL.B., Schwartz has also been involved with Toronto's Board of Jewish Education, Bnei Akiva Schools (of which he is a founder), and Sunnybrook Health Science Centre.

Schwartz also has a more personal connection to Bar-Ilan. His son David heads its information systems division as well as its Virtual Jewish University.

In fact, three of Schwartz' four children live in Israel. He and his wife Faygie have 20 grandchildren.

Here in Toronto, Phil Schwartz expects his involvement in Canadian Friends – which has offices in Toronto, Montreal and Vancouver – will continue on a more informal basis.

"Guys in my age cohort must start turning things over to younger leadership," he stressed, adding that he's prepared "to do anything they ask of me that's reasonable."

Que. judge urges action against domestic violence

By MICHAEL REGENSTREIF

MONTREAL — "The fight against domestic violence must remain in the public eye and continue to be a government priority," said Quebec Superior Court Justice Herbert Marx.

Marx, who as Quebec's minister of justice in 1986 brought in legislation mandating a "zero tolerance" policy toward perpetrators of domestic violence, was speaking at the recent annual general meeting of Auberge Shalom...pour femmes, the Jewish shelter for women and their children in abusive relationships. The meeting was held at Cummings House and attracted a large turnout.

Marx pointed out it is only in the past 60 years that women in Quebec have incrementally achieved full rights of citizenship, including the right to vote in 1960 and to sit on juries in 1971.

Women, he said, were legally subordinated to their husbands "who had some sort of right of property" over their wives. Only in 1961, he added, were married women allowed to enter into contracts without their husband's signature.

Despite the legal progress of recent years, "power differentials still prevail" between men and women, Marx said.

In Quebec, 10 percent of women have been victims of domestic violence and children in these homes "grow up to believe that violence is a normal way to control women," thus perpetuating the cycle, Marx said.

Only one in 10 cases are reported

Marx looked back on the attitudes that prevailed prior to the introduction of the "zero tolerance" policy in 1986. "Courts then rarely convicted wife batterers," he said. One justification for legal inaction was that "imprisoning an abusive husband would deprive his wife of financial support."

Marx said since 1986, the justice system has taken a different approach. Domestic violence is now treated as a crime and investigated and prosecuted as such. Even in cases where an abused woman will not testify against her husband, common-law husband or boyfriend, crown prosecutors are obligated to pursue cases when police can assemble independent evidence.

Marx said it is "important to remove an abuser from the family home" and that those who have been charged and prosecuted "are less likely to repeat their offence."

Marx cautioned, though, that the criminal justice system is not a panacea for all problems of domestic abuse. It does not, he said, "deal with psychological and economic abuse."

And despite the progress of recent years, Marx estimated only about one in 10 cases of domestic violence in Quebec are reported. Women's shelters, he said, are only able to reach about 15 to 20 percent of victims. As well, Crown prosecutors complain of meager resources in their efforts to bring perpetrators before the law.

Marx stressed teaching children how to act in relationships was of paramount importance in stopping the perpetuation of domestic violence.

The meeting also heard reports by Jill Martis, president of Auberge Shalom, and executive director Diane Sasson detailing many of the educational, advocacy and outreach programs aimed at ending cycles of conjugal violence in the Jewish community and in the greater society.

In the past year, services were provided to 114 women and 114 children at Auberge Shalom and to more than 500 women who called the 24-hour telephone line. Since opening in 1989, more than 900 women and 1,000 children have found shelter there.

Special presentations were made to Auberge Shalom's founding president Miriam Charron, and to Bina and Leonard Ellen, who provided funding for the purchase of the house that is home to the shelter.

Israel, PA said close to summit agreement

By ALUF BENN
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Public Security Minister Shlomo Ben-Ami said, last Saturday, that "the Israeli and Palestinian positions have never been so close, and we are coming close to forming a basis for a summit."

Ben-Ami, who heads the Israeli negotiating team dealing with the framework agreement which will form the basis of a permanent status agreement, added: "We are doing all the clarification work and clearing up misunderstandings now to enable the Americans to convene such a meeting."

A senior political source in Jerusalem recently said that the Palestinians were showing "a greater readiness...to take part in a three-way summit." Until now, they rejected a proposal by Prime Minister Ehud Barak for a summit with Palestinian Authority Chairman Yasser Arafat and U.S. President Bill Clinton.

Israel has proposed July 5 as a possible date for the summit. The source, who is involved in the talks with the Palestinians, said "they too understand the importance of the summit. The agreement is as vital to them as it is to us, and they prefer, as we do, to utilize the trust that has evolved with Clinton, and not to start from zero with the new president."

Ben-Ami believes that such a three-way summit will create "a new political energy" that will compel the leaders to make decisions while the world looks on.

The Americans, however, do not believe the time is right yet for a summit. Sources say that both sides want to reach agreement on all the issues currently outstanding, even the toughest ones, such as Jerusalem and the refugees.

The only article of the agreement over which there is no dispute is the establishment of a Palestinian state with Israel's recognition. However, Israel wants a declaration by the Palestinians that the conflict between the two nations has ended and a pledge to solve future conflicts peacefully.

According to Ben-Ami, the Palestinians will not agree on the end of the conflict unless they receive a stake in Jerusalem. Barak announced that he would only discuss Jerusalem at a summit.

Ben-Ami said there have been no negotiations over the capital, but other sources claim that the idea of hoisting the Palestinian flag on the Temple Mount and other sites was raised during informal discussions, as was some form of Palestinian sovereignty (possibly municipal) over Arab quarters of Jerusalem with a corridor between Abu Dis and the Old City.

U.S. Secretary of State Madeleine Albright was scheduled to join Ross in the region on Tuesday for a lightning 24-hour visit to talk with Arafat and Barak. After that, she is expected to recommend to Clinton whether or not to set up the three-way summit meeting.

Israel readies for Iran missile

By AMIR OREN
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Israeli intelligence assessments assert that Iran is planning a second test launch of its Shihab-3 surface-to-surface ballistic missile in the coming weeks.

The preparations under way in Iran for the launching of the missile, whose range is estimated to be 1,300 kilometres, have caused anxiety in Israel and the West.

The first test launching of the missile, whose range covers all of Israel, was carried out in total surprise in July 1998.

The steering committee for arms control, headed by the acting chief of the National Security Council, Maj.-Gen. (Res.) Gideon Shefer, met recently to discuss the developments. The committee includes representatives from the intelligence community, the IDF, the assistant to the defence minister for special assignments, the Defence and Foreign Ministries, the Atomic Energy Commission and the defence industries involved in the development of the anti-ballistic missile system, the Arrow.

During the meeting, military intelligence presented its assessment that Iran is moving rapidly toward making its long-range missiles operational. While the missiles will not be operational by western standards, not having entered into regular production, for Iran's needs it is significant that its enemies know that it possesses such capability.

Military intelligence stresses that the significance of the second Shihab-3 launch is strategic, not operational or tactical. Iran is believed to be at least five years away from fitting a nuclear warhead to the Shihab-3.

The ballistic missiles are expected to give Iran the status of a power in the same league as surrounding countries such as Pakistan, Iraq and Israel.

According to military intelligence, Russia is exercising a policy of aiding Iran, directed by the Minister of Atomic Energy, Evgeny Adamov. This includes help in nuclear energy.

One of the sensitive issues discussed by the steering committee is the balance between stressing the dangers inherent in the development of the Iranian ballistic missile program, in an effort to attract greater U.S. support, as against the possibility of causing panic among the Israeli public.

Verdict expected July 1 for Iranians

It's unclear whether the primary judge in the case, who also acts as the prosecutor, is truly labouring over his verdict, or is carrying out a ruse to give the veneer of judicial consensus and the impression that he has not judged alone, said Malcolm Hoenlein, executive vice-chair of the Conference of Presidents of Major American Jewish Organizations, which has lobbied on behalf of the Jews.

"This is the game they play, to keep delaying it and delaying it," Hoenlein said. "The reason this time may be because they are waiting for a political decision" on what verdict to render, "rather than a judicial decision."

According to the report in the New York Times, many people in Tehran's legal circles have said that the charges in the trial that opened on April 13 behind closed doors are weak. They predicted that the verdict will reflect this.

To keep up the pressure on Tehran, Hoenlein's organization and the Simon Wiesenthal Centre are circulating a petition in which they hope to collect one million signatures demanding the freedom of the Iran 13.

Regardless of the verdict, sometimes noisy protests in the United States and international condemnation may generate some positive, albeit unintended, consequences within Iran.

In the Iranian parliament, known as the Majlis – recently reconfigured and now dominated by reformists – reformists have introduced a number of proposals to amend the country's press law.

One proposal would allow foreign media and observers into future court trials, according to Hoenlein, who noted that the reformists did not specifically mention the trial of the Iranian Jews.

The policy of closed trials, the legislators say, has severely damaged the nation's international image.

Israel experiencing growing wave of violence

By VIVA PRESS
CJN Israel Bureau

JERUSALEM — A toddler was beaten to death after he "interrupted" a relative watching a soccer game on television. A fight over a beach chair ended in murder. A man killed a stranger in a road rage incident. And a Haifa man killed his wife, then committed suicide.

These four incidents, which all took place last week in Israel, highlight the growing wave in acts of violence rocking the country.

There have been four rage-related murders in five days. In each of the cases, the attacker has asserted his rights through violence.

Haifa sociology professor Arye Ratner says the recent spate of violence is part of a trend.

"There isn't necessarily a connection between the recent homicide cases, however it is part of a trend that the Israeli society is undergoing in the last decade," he told Israel Radio.

Ratner said that in 1990 there were 276 violent offences per 100,000 people as compared to 588 cases per 100,000 people in 1999. While these figures do show a rise, Israel's overall murder rate is very low compared to other countries.

Still violence, as a response, should not be taken as a surprise.

"Israel, since its establishment, is a society that has all the ingredients to become a violent society. It's a society with conflict, with tension, with cleavages," said Ratner. "All of these ingredients are operating at the same time and are turning us into a more violent society."

Hebrew University professor of social work, Rami Benbenishty, agrees.

"We're facing difficult issues in terms of one nation. The [recent coalition conflict with] Shas shows we find it difficult to unite on any one issue," Benbenishty told the Canadian Jewish News. "I think we all feel Israeli society is becoming weaker in terms of social cohesion."

Over the years, the social cohesion that kept Israelis together – due to security issues or wars – is now declining and violence is erupting.

The recent murders, say Ratner and Benbenishty, are a result of spontaneous violence. "I think we've learned in recent years to use violence as a result to conflicts," Ratner told Israel Radio. "The use of violence is becoming more and more legitimate."

Last week, State Attorney Edna Arbel called on the government to change its priorities and invest more resources to battle violent crime.

"I intend to place this serious matter on the government's agenda," said Arbel in a statement released to the media. "We, as a society, and the government as our leaders, must determine our priorities. We must make courageous decisions and allocate resources accordingly."

Benbenishty reiterated that "many people feel they need to be cared for much more than they are." He said if there is a further weakening in Israeli society of social cohesion, then it is certain that the "sense of deep discomfort" will strengthen – and violence as a reaction will continue to brew.

Britain warned against Holocaust-denial law

By RICHARD ALLEN GREENE
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

LONDON — Passing a new law outlawing Holocaust denial is not the best way to combat the problem, says a panel of British lawyers.

The recommendation came about two months after British Holocaust denier David Irving lost a multimillion-dollar libel case against American historian Deborah Lipstadt in London.

Holocaust denial is "fanciful, inconsequential stuff," said Anthony Julius, who chaired the panel of experts and led Lipstadt's legal defence.

"The present risk that Holocaust deniers pose can best be dealt with by education," he added.

The Institute for Jewish Policy Research delivered the report to British Home Secretary Jack Straw earlier this month – on the same day London's Imperial War Museum opened a new permanent exhibition on the Holocaust.

Straw welcomed the report, calling it "very helpful" and promised to look carefully at its recommendations, which include a call for a "drive to raise public awareness of the Holocaust."

The report, the result of 18 months of work, argues that outlawing Holocaust denial "could be seen as an illegitimate infringement on the right to freedom of expression."

It also points to the problem of adequately defining Holocaust denial, and observes that there is no evidence that legal prohibitions in countries that outlaw denial have had an impact on the problem.

"Notwithstanding the harms inflicted by hate speech, freedom of expression is a primary right in a democratic society and applies especially to speech that is offensive, disturbing or shocking," the report says.

The report recognizes that Holocaust denial is "not offensive solely to Jews," but "to all who are informed about the facts of the Holocaust," and that "Holocaust denial has an implicit intent to engender hatred."

Education stressed

At the same time, the authors of the report say Holocaust denial is not a significant problem in Britain, despite the publicity surrounding the Irving trial.

On the contrary, "there may have been a slight decrease in the distribution of Holocaust-denial material in the United Kingdom in the 1990s," according to the report.

British law prohibits inciting racial hatred, but "no one has been prosecuted specifically for producing or disseminating Holocaust-denial literature," according to the report.

(The report, Combating Holocaust Denial through Law in the United Kingdom, is available at http://www.jpr.org.uk/publications/reports/civil_society/No_3_2000/index.htm)

A WORLD OF VALUES

Charities may benefit from Seagram sale

By JULIE WIENER
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

NEW YORK — The name Bronfman means "whiskey man" in Yiddish.

But the Bronfman family – whose members have given millions of dollars to Jewish causes around the world – is severing its generations-long connection to whiskey and spirits.

And this may give them more cash to spend on Jewish causes.

Edgar Bronfman Sr. and his brother, Charles, are among a handful of mega-philanthropists in the Jewish world, and they have each given millions of dollars to established Jewish organizations, as well as to their own Jewish ventures.

Last week, the Bronfmans sold their multibillion-dollar business, Joseph E. Seagram and Sons, to Vivendi, a French media company. The whiskey company was bought by Edgar and Charles' father, Samuel, in 1928.

Neither Edgar nor Charles agreed to be interviewed, citing the advice of their attorneys.

Samuel Bronfman (bottom row, second from left) and his family became well known for their generosity on behalf of Jewish causes.

But observers of their philanthropic habits predict that the sale of the family's stake in Seagram – valued at $6.8 billion according to the New York Times – can only be good news for the family's Jewish communal beneficiaries.

"It will give them more financial resources," said David Mersky, a senior lecturer in Jewish philanthropy at Brandeis University's Hornstein Program in Jewish Communal Service, who noted that the Bronfman philanthropy is "legendary.

"Would that there were 34 more people like them to give like they do," he added.

"They give not only a lot, but creatively and in a way that encourages others to do likewise. They've been responsible for bringing other mega-donors to the table and they're outstanding leaders in addition to being great philanthropists."

According to Jonathan Sarna, Braun professor of American Jewish history at Brandeis University, the sale may leave more of the assets ending up in the hands of the Jewishly committed elder Bronfmans than had the money remained tied up in the business.

Sam, the Bronfman patriarch who died in 1971, was also known for his Jewish philanthropy. The child of Russian Jewish immigrants, Sam was a longtime president of Canadian Jewish Congress and active in the Jewish federation world, said his biographer, Michael Marrus.

"Was he a learned or sophisticated Jewish leader? Absolutely not," said Marrus, who is dean of the University of Toronto's graduate school. "But he set new standards for Jewish philanthropy. The pressure to give until it hurts – that had Sam's stamp on it."

The sale of the company may give the current senior Bronfmans additional time to devote to philanthropic causes, suggested Jeremy Burton, associate executive director of the Jewish Funders Network, of which both Charles and Edgar are members.

"If, in fact, they are no longer going to be in the day-to-day management of the business, we may see a period where they are giving even more of their time to their philanthropic passions and leadership," said Burton.

Edgar, 71, is president of the World Jewish Congress, where he led the battle to reclaim dormant Holocaust-era Swiss bank accounts for survivors and their heirs. He is also chair of the board of governors of Hillel: The Foundation for Jewish Campus Life and most recently partnered with two other philanthropists to form an organization promoting synagogue transformation and renewal.

Charles, 68, is chair of the newly formed federation umbrella organization, United Jewish Communities (UJC), and founded Birthright Israel together with hedge-fund manager, turned philanthropist, Michael Steinhardt.

Birthright this year began sending young Jewish adults on free 10-day trips to Israel. So far 8,000 participants have benefited from the trips, and the program recently snagged over $200 million in financial commitments from additional philanthropists, the Israeli government and the UJC.

Charles was also one of the founders of the Partnership for Excellence in Jewish Education, a foundation providing seed money to new Jewish day schools.

The third Bronfman generation, including Edgar Bronfman Jr., who ran Seagram for the past six years, during which time he added Universal Studios and Geffen Records to the company's portfolio, has been far less visible in Jewish philanthropic circles than the older Bronfmans.

Jack Wertheimer, who is provost of the Conservative movement's Jewish Theological Seminary and has written on Jewish philanthropic trends, said the Bronfman brothers have been particularly notable in their Jewish giving because of their focus on "here and now projects – identifying what are some of the most pressing areas of Jewish need" as opposed to long-term endowments.

Wertheimer also said the two are distinctive in their "willingness to work in partnership with other large funders."

Samuel Bronfman

Sarna noted that the Bronfman brothers are also unique in that the two have both donated through foundation giving and have "elected to operate within existing institutions of the Jewish community, like the World Jewish Congress and United Jewish Communities.

The Week in Israel

June 19

• A delegation of Israeli officials traveled to Turkey to look into purchasing water to avert what experts warn could be an unprecedented shortage. The trip was criticized by Environment Minister Dalia Itzik, who said Israel must not be dependent on foreign sources for water.

June 20

• Israel proposed a three-way summit for July 5 with U.S. President Bill Clinton, Prime Minister Ehud Barak and PA President Yasser Arafat, to hammer out an outline of a final peace accord.

June 21

• The IDF plans to issue riot-control gear to soldiers guarding Jewish settlements in the West Bank and Gaza. A military source confirmed reports that the army would soon distribute tear-gas canisters and rubber-coated metal bullets to troops protecting the 145 Jewish communities.

June 22

• The government was saved from collapse when the Shas Party withdrew its resignations less than an hour before they were to take effect. While agreeing to remain in the government, Shas made it clear they would not automatically support Barak in the peace process. The last-minute resolution was made possible by the resignation from the government of three Meretz Party cabinet members.

June 23

• Foreign investment in Israel totaled $4.31 billion (US) during the first five months of the year, compared with $2.06 billion in the same period of 1999, according to the Bank of Israel. For all of last year, foreign investment totalled $4.85 billion.

Yemenite advocates want full disclosure on kidnappings

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — When he was a kid, Moshe Behar spent a lot of time in the shower scrubbing his dark skin to make it as light as that of his parents. Even as a child, it struck him as odd that he didn't look anything like his parents.

Now he knows why.

Behar's biological parents were Yemenite Jews but at a very early age he was snatched away from his mother and put up for adoption. At around 10 his parents told him he was adopted, but it took another 30 years for him to track down and meet his biological mother.

For all that, Behar, who now lives in Toronto, is one of the lucky ones, at least according to advocates for kidnapped Yemenite children.

Today, 50 years after the fact, hundreds if not thousands of Yemenite parents still don't know what happened to their children and the government of Israel has been of little help in helping to reunite the families.

Worst still, it was the government itself and Jewish agencies helping to absorb Yemenite immigrants that kidnapped the children and placed them up for adoption in the first place, asserts Moshe Nahum, president of The International Federation for Yemenite Community and head of The International Federation for the Missing Children (OHALIVA).

Nahum, who lives in Rehovot, was in Toronto recently where he described developments in the Yemenis' longstanding dispute with the Israeli government.

After 50 years, the government continues to place obstacles in the way of full disclosure. The Yemenite community wants Israeli officials to reveal what really happened and it also wants an accounting of valuables like gold, embroidered clothing and holy books that were taken from the olim, he said.

More importantly, the Yemenite community wants to know what happened to the children. Some parents had two or even three taken from them, including children up to five years old. "How do you want the parents to feel? To sit quiet? You tell me," Nahum said.

Moshe Nahum

At the time, parents were told their children had died in hospital but not one death certificate was ever issued and some coffins that were supposed to contain children's bodies were opened and found to be empty. It was just a subterfuge, a scheme to keep the parents quiet while the children were sold abroad, at about $5,000 apiece, Nahum asserted.

Despite the severity of the allegations and the personal pain experienced by Yemenite Jews, the vast majority are still fervent supporters of the State of Israel, Nahum stated.

For his part, Behar too harbours little animosity towards the government. A former parachutist in the Israel Defence Force, Behar maintains "I'm an Israeli. I love Israel. It's my country."

He speculates about the kidnappers' supposed motives – some sort of paternalistic social engineering scheme to take Jewish children from families that had six or seven youngsters and give them to childless couples, many of them Holocaust survivors – and he said he can even understand that way of thinking.

But is he resentful at all?

"When I find out the truth, I'll make a decision about that," he answers.

Many Yemenites are running out of patience, Nahum stated. Faced with government silence and three investigatory commissions that still have not uncovered the truth, some are advocating drastic steps.

"I don't want to embarrass the Israeli government abroad but some 250 Yemenite families want to fly to New York, go to the United Nations and have a hunger strike in front of the building to expose the situation," Nahum said. "I'm trying to stop that so as not to destroy the government we are [relying] on."

Nahum would like to see Diaspora communities use their influence with Israel to urge the state to reveal all it knows about the kidnappings.

"I know very little about the issue" said Moshe Ronen, president of Canadian Jewish Congress, but "I would have no hesitation" about getting Congress involved. "This is a time for openness, for coming clean in many areas...Congress would certainly consider getting involved if we're asked."

In Israel, political pressure from the Yemenite community has prompted the establishment of three distinct inquiries. Nahum dismisses them as whitewashes.

Currently, a state committee of inquiry, which includes Supreme Court judge Yaacov Kedmi, has been investigating the question. It began its work in 1995. The committee has questioned 1,000 witnesses, including 900 family members of "absentees" and 100 absorption and immigration employees.

The committee stated on its Web site (www.tayman-child.gov.il) that it has looked into the disappearance of 816 children (Nahum says the number is much higher) and it believes it "can supply the parents with answers concerning the fate of about 680 absentees."

Its main difficulty is that the archives from immigrant camps, nurseries, hospitals and burial societies "were lost, in whole or in part," the committee stated. It called on the public to help in locating people of Yemenite origin who grew up in non-Yemenite families.

Snatched from his mother's arms

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Ever since he learned at age 10 that he was adopted, Moshe Behar lived believing his biological parents were dead and that he'd have to get on with his life. Although he had a troubled youth – running away from home for three days, being sent to a kibbutz when his adoptive parents couldn't control him – he straightened himself out, found a good job, married a Canadian tourist and moved to Canada.

In 1989 he travelled to Israel to obtain a copy of his medical records. He was stunned when a social worker told him that according to her records, his biological parents were still alive.

Behar recalls he was shocked by the news and "felt a strong desire to find out what's going on."Six years later, Behar returned to Israel to finally meet his biological mother.

The meeting in the Children's Aid offices in Yaffo was emotional and memorable. "My mother hugged me, she kissed me and then she fainted.

"We spoke for quite a while. I had lots of questions to ask. She told me about her life."

Behar's mother was an orphan in Yemen. When Yemenite Jews were airlifted to Israel, she, her sister and brother-in-law joined the modern day Exodus.

"But the plane couldn't take off, so all the gold, the bibles, the books were left behind in baskets," Behar said. The olim were told their property would follow on another flight. They never had their property returned.

Biological father did not want to meet with him

When his mother got to Israel at age 13, her brother-in-law arranged a marriage. Before the wedding, the prospective groom got Behar's mother pregnant and then abandoned her. "My mother and her sister decided to keep the baby," Behar said and at 48, he now knows he was born in a hotel where his mother worked as a cleaner.

"Big people came and took you away. I didn't even give you milk," his mother told him.

She was later told her son was taken to a hospital and that he died there.

"She told me she went everywhere and tried to locate me. They went crazy, they yelled and screamed. But there was nothing they could do about the 'big people'," Behar said.

Behar hired a private detective to locate his biological father. But the man didn't want to meet his son, fearing Behar was after his money. He threatened to tell the family of Behar's mother about her youthful indiscretion if Behar pursued it.

Today, Behar, who works in the electronics industry, lives with his wife, Lauren Torbin and daughter, Brittany, in mid-town Toronto. His ex-wife and two other daughters live in London, Ont. His adoptive parents, natives of Turkey, have died.

Behar harbours little ill-will towards the Israeli government. He's even turned down numerous lawyers who want to take his case to court. "One lawyer told me there's no monetary price if someone takes you away from your own family," he said.

But right now, "what I really want is for all truth to come out," he said.

New group offers support to women with cancer

L'Chaim cancer support group for Jewish women recently held a gift bag assemblage party.

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO – "We are your Jewish sisters. We've been there and we care" is the motto of L'Chaim, a new group offering support to women recently diagnosed with cancer.

Everyone involved is a cancer survivor.

Spokesperson Clara Shore said that "many women who find out they have cancer feel that they have nowhere to turn. There is a great feeling of isolation."

To lessen this hardship, the group is creating a database, which includes the name of each volunteer and what kind of cancer they had.

"We will make this database known to the community, so that when someone is diagnosed or needs help, we can put them in touch with someone who had the same thing," Shore said.

A training day in May with professionals from Jewish Family & Child Service taught the volunteers how to speak compassionately with people dealing with this difficult situation.

Elizabeth Erlich, who is co-founder of L'Chaim, is a strong proponent of the telephone support buddy. "Many people [diagnosed with cancer] feel it is a very private matter. They want to talk to someone, but at the same time they want it to remain private."

L'Chaim is not stopping at providing a friendly voice on the phone. The organization has created a kit for those newly diagnosed with cancer. It will include information on coping with cancer, support groups, Internet sites, books, and genetic testing, toiletries and a book of humour.

There is also what Erlich and co-founder Marci Tenenbaum call "Jewish specific content." This will talk about Jewish Family & Child Service, the community chaplaincy service, and such special things as meals of thanks and the healing project.

The kit includes a coupon for that most effective of Jewish all-purpose remedies – kosher chicken soup.

There is also a special packet for young mothers and information about how to observe the mikvah.

Shore noted everything in the kit, including the binder itself, has been donated. (Those who wish to donate will be issued tax receipts through Meoroth.)

To contact L'Chaim call 633-0409. Mailing address is 21 Midvale Rd., North York, Ont. M3H 3H8.

Academic acupuncture clinic opens

TORONTO — Traditional Chinese medicine merged with modern western medicine recently, as Mount Sinai Hospital and The Michener Institute opened the first academic acupuncture clinic to be based in a Canadian teaching hospital.

Acupuncture will be offered as a method of treatment in the hospital's Wasser Pain Management Centre which delivers comprehensive care for chronic pain. The acupuncture treatments will be administered by certified Michener staff and senior students who will also use the opportunity as a teaching tool.

"The expansion of alternative medicine has raised many questions from Canadians about the effectiveness of acupuncture. It makes sense that we join forces with The Michener Institute to pioneer this field in Canadian medicine by exploring the benefits of acupuncture and its potential to improve the health of our patients," said Mount Sinai Hospital president and chief executive officer Ted Freedman.

The new program extends a long history of collaboration between the institutions, dating back more than 35 years. "It was in 1965 that Dr. Harry Strawbridge, our chief of pathology became the founding governor of The Michener, then called the Toronto Institute of Medical Technology," said Mount Sinai Hospital board chair Bernard Ghert.

In 1997, The Michener Institute established a full-time, four-year acupuncture program in response to the growing public interest and recognition of traditional Chinese Medicine and healing techniques.

The program is one of the first in Canada to successfully combine the teachings of eastern and western medicine. Fully qualified acupuncturists will begin graduating from the institute in the year 2002.

"This clinic will allow us to share our expertise in TCM with one of Canada's leading health care providers," said Renate Krakauer, president and chief executive officer of The Michener Institute.

Mount Sinai plans to introduce an endowment for research in traditional Chinese Medicine later in the year, to be based out of the Wasser Pain Management Centre. This research endowment will be funded in part by proceeds raised from the Chinese community at the hospital's Pacific Bridge Gala Dinner in the fall.

Acupuncture as a profession is more than 5,000 years old. It involves the insertion of hair-fine needles on the surface of the body to stimulate an individual's natural healing energy and to bring Yin and Yang back to balance based on the meridian theory of traditional Chinese Medicine.

Stormy weather a perfect accompaniment to concert

By MORDECHAI BEN-DAT

TORONTO — Thunder rolled outside, and shards of lightning lit up the furiously clouded, dark sky outside. It was a dramatic and surreal background to the Third Annual Cantorial Concert on the evening of June 14 at the Shaarei Shomayim.

Nature's stormy accompaniment merely added to the electric feeling that filled the sanctuary of the synagogue as four stellar cantors treated the full-house audience to what was truly billed as "an unforgettable evening of Broadway, cantorial, chassidic and operatic music."

The musical anchor of the evening was Cantor Yaakov Motzen of the host synagogue Shaarei Shomayim.

He is a fifth-generation chazzan. And it showed. A master of technique and a moving purveyor of the power of liturgy both through the poetry of the prayer and the spirituality of the music, his tenor voice is distinguished by a deep, velvety, comforting gravity.

Hosted by Motzen were Moshe Schulhof, of the Aventura Turnberry Jewish Centre Beth Jacob of Miami, Benjamin Moshe Warschawski of the Ner Tamid Greenspring Valley Synagogue in Baltimore and Cantor Shlomo Simcha Sufrin, the chazzan sheini (second chazzan) of the host Toronto synagogue, Shaarei Shomayim.

The four men combined for a unique musical event in a 20-performance repertoire – solo, duets, and tous ensemble – that offered a diverse range of auditory pleasures and evoked abundant emotional responses.

Schulhof's voice, sweet, piercingly gentle, brought many to tears in his heartwrenching rendition in Yiddish, of the famous song by Mordecai Gebertig, Moishele Main Fraind. The way he lingered over the lyrics, especially the recurrent line "How do we retrieve the years gone by," was a veritable union with the poet's sense of plaintive cry.

Sufrin sang two nigunim/tefillot in the modern "Yeshivish" style, popularized by singers such as Mordechai Ben-David, inheritors all of the Shlomo Carlebach embrace of traditional liturgy.

With mike in hand, Sufrin left the loftier perch of the sanctuary bimah, to bring the song "closer" to the audience. His high energy level and ability to range high into the upper octave level of the music caused the audience to sway and clap and even sing along with him in enthusiastic appreciation.

The big surprise of the evening was the introduction for the first time in a Toronto venue, of young Benjamin Warschawski. By physical stature and musical preference he was pure opera.

Shlomo Simcha Sufrin, second chazzan of Shaarei Shomayim.

Four of the five songs he sang solo were traditional opera arias, a selection which highlighted his considerable musical skill ranging from the tearful pleading of Core N'grato by Cardillo to the lovelorn melancholy of Bizet's La Fleur Que Tu M'avais Jetee and the fluffy frolic of La Danza by Rossini.

Warschawski has a powerful presence and a rich, superb voice that will season and mellow and become even more poignant over the years through the insight that follows inevitable hurts and pains that life visits on us all.

Beautiful harmony

Among the most moving moments from the many such moments that evening were a particularly lovely and delicate rendition of Shma B'ni that featured a duet "conversation" between Motzen and his son Shmulik, the beautiful harmony in the prayer for Tal sung by cantors Motzen and Schulhof, and the ensemble medley of Ani Ma'amin.

The combined artistic force of the four chazzanim in the medley was like watching the gliding movements of a sailing schooner skimming across the sun-sparkled waters of a vast ocean: Motzen's voice, the rudder, providing direction, Warschawski's sonorous tones the ballast, and the soaring voices of Schulhof and Sufrin, the wind in the sails.

The evening's program also featured the fine piano accompaniment of Cantor Daniel Gildar of Philadelphia, who was often called upon to perform arduous flourishes and passages, especially in the mellifluous Tal duet, and the steady voices of the Shaarei Shomayim choir under the direction of Stephen Glass from Montreal.

Saxophonist blows patriotic note

By ADAM BELLO
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Toronto concert saxophonist Daniel Rubinoff will be setting concertos aside this coming holiday weekend to play a more patriotic note.

Making his own contribution to the final Canada Day of the 20th Century, Rubinoff will premiere The Canada Song before audiences at Nathan Philip Square on July 1 at 1 p.m.

Receiving sponsorship from the City of Toronto for its launch, the award-winning Jewish Canadian classical performer says he hopes the piece will inspire other musicians to further develop a genre for nationalism.

"It really is far and between that we [as Canadians] have any songs of a patriotic nature, and I feel there should be something new musically in this area to mark the millennium," says Rubinoff, who co-wrote the song with his wife, songwriter Heidi Schwartz.

"It was written with choir performance in mind, so it's great for audience participation. We made the lyrics simple for children to learn (Nation Young/Still planting seeds/And growing with her people's needs/This Canada can be in us/Canada can live in us), and I think it will help those new to our country understand some of the fundamental values we hold as Canadians."

Later that day, the choral group the Jubilaires of Peterborough, Rubinoff's original hometown, will perform their rendition of The Canada Song at the National Arts Centre in Ottawa.

The Canada Song is an advance single for his next studio album, The Music of Daniel Rubinoff, currently in production. Rubinoff says a French language version of the song will also be recorded for its completion.

Artist's blindness drives him to new creative goals

By JOYCE SINGER
Special to The CJN

"I see the arts not for purposes of entertaining, but for purposes of educating." – Ronald Satok.

TORONTO — Muralist Ronald Satok, so far in this life, has been a son, husband, father, artist, jazz buff, dancer, raconteur, motivator and highly respected teacher.

He is the spirit and the soul of the non-profit Satok School of the Arts, whose mandate is to "break the boundaries... and enrich the lives of the so-called disabled, disadvantaged and able-bodied communities through their involvement in... and production of high quality works of art."

Ronald Satok

At 68, Satok continues to work at his craft, albeit with some adjustments. You see, since 1978, he has been blind as a result of glaucoma. He professes, in his classes and seminars, that nobody should be limited to society's preconceptions, regardless of whether they have special needs, that life is to be lived to its fullest and every moment savoured, whatever the age or circumstance.

Like Ludwig von Beethoven, who composed his most famous works after he became deaf, Satok's so-called handicap has not hindered him. Instead it fuelled him to re-evaluate his situation, propelling him to search for new ways to be creatively productive.

He is thus a living example of what talent, ego, sheer determination, devoted family, good friends and a noble heart can accomplish.

He has worked with painting, drawing, mosaic tiles and sculpture, and his thematic periods have encompassed influences from the Japanese (Sumo), sacred Jewish art, and the progressive stages of life from birth to death.

Originally trained in Art Education, his time spent as an instructor and art therapist in 1964 at The Children's Village, a residential treatment centre for boys in Dobb's Ferry, N.Y., foreshadowed his current vocation with the Satok School of the Arts.

It is a renowned summer program where students are introduced to the visual arts via music, movement and other forms of innovative self-expression.

"No matter how talented or imaginative people are, you've still got to catalyze them," Satok says. "The whole school came into being because I wanted to work with kids. Some of the kids that come here are disabled, some not. I usually think of a project that excites me, and then the fund-raising begins."

His Cabbagetown home houses the school and the gallery. Impressive paintings, sculptures and photographs from various eras of Satok's career up to the present time, adorn the walls.

Curious visitors who dare to venture into the backyard will discover an elephant, a giraffe and a lion! But the neighbours don't complain, because it's a virtual zoo of brightly coloured sculptures placed there to captivate and motivate his students.

As well, there's a makeshift studio, which provides even more creative space where the children can work.

Prior to losing his sight, Satok left his artistic imprint, through his murals and sculptures, in Jewish community centres, synagogues and temples throughout North America. Major collections graced such far-flung international venues as the Golda Meir Collection in Israel, The Atelier Mourlot in France and the Museum of Sumo in Japan. Notable fans have run the gamut from his buddy, jazz great Dizzy Gillespie to the luminous Jackie Kennedy.

Five years ago, he launched an exhibit of new works he created after losing his sight – Sight Unseen: The Satok Experience, which was received to great acclaim. Last year, he inspired the Art For Everyone Festival, which featured his Star of David theme.

"The Art For Everyone Festival... took many minds, hands and artistic skills to develop the whole process, which began with my drawings," Satok says.

Among his many helpers were John Holt, an engineer/carpenter who translated Satok's drawings into an eight-foot-high sculpture; longtime friend Garth Haines, who collaborated on the elaborate colour schemes; Gillian Dempsey, an Art history major from U of T, who fashioned a template for it; and Ronald's son, Michael Satok-Wolman, who visited frequently with constructive comments on its progress.

Photographer Susan Pollack (chair of the board of the Satok School of the Arts) photographed the colourful sculpture against a white wall, with a white floor covering beneath it, creating the feeling that it was suspended in space. The lower triangle points towards earth, while the upper triangle points towards heaven.

In concert with these and other talented friends, Satok created his new sculpture, The Star of David, bringing his latest artistic vision to light.

Simon's quest begins with Jason Levine

"The whole concept of Prozzäk is like a play – we're always playing characters. We can be as shmaltzy as we want to be – with no pretences.

"In a way, we don't have to worry about being cool – you can be influenced by Neil Diamond without being laughed at.

"It's so ironic," Levine said, "that by creating a character that isn't real, I'm allowed much more freedom to be myself.

"The creation of characters is normal in every other art form – film, theatre. Yet, for some reason in music, there's a feeling that you have to be super real or you're not cool.

"That's a phony notion," he said. Prozzäk's fans know that the characters aren't real, but they really connect with the whole story.

"An integral part of our act is our Web site [www.prozzak.com], and fans write to us, they send us pictures and drawings. They want to know how and what Simon would feel in different situations.

"Simon has his own personality and we really want to stick close to the program.

"The great thing about cartoon characters is that they never age."

When Levine was younger, his first band played at his brother's bar mitzvah.

His brother, John, is now a member of the band, The Philosopher Kings.

Levine remembers playing an AC/DC song at the bar mitzvah. It was pretty radical at the time, but it didn't bother me, he said.

"For me, being Jewish isn't about being religious, it's about a strong sense of culture and identity.

"A lot of the drive I have is related to my being Jewish."

After graduating from Thornhill Secondary School, Levine went to McGill University to study psychology. From there, he joined The Philosopher Kings, where he met James McCollum, who plays Milo in Prozzäk.

"One day, when we were on tour, McCollum and I started to write together. We made a recording at Sony and put it on our A & R's [artists and representatives'] desk.

"He really liked it, and so the concept of Prozzäk got off the ground.

"Initially," Levine said, "I thought I would do this as a cathartic release and develop this character as psychotherapy for myself.

"That part of it really worked, As soon as I invented this character, my own personal life really changed.

"Even my parents are proud of me. Now, it's all right that I'm not a lawyer," he said. "It started to be all right about four years ago."

Levine and McCollum have also moved into writing and producing other artists. Their production company, LeftHook Productions wrote and produced b4-4's recent hit single, Get Down.

Prozzäk is also currently working towards morning cartoons, and there are plans for a feature film, Levine said.

"My ultimate goal," he said, "is to have Simon do a duet with Barbara Streisand. I think her husband might be jealous – of Simon, of course, not of me."

FOLKSINGER CONTEMPLATES MUSICAL ABOUT TEREZIN

Folksinging legend Janis Ian, who was born Janis Fink, is working on a stage musical about the Terezin concentration camp that she hopes to bring to Broadway.

Cultural critics either loved or hated last year's comic film, Life Is Beautiful, by Roberto Benigni. What many may not have anticipated is that the award-winning film, which used Auschwitz as the backdrop for a humane comedy, was the "thin edge of the wedge" — the vanguard of many more Hollywoodized and theatrical treatments of stories using Holocaust themes and motifs.

In a recent interview with the London Jewish Chronicle, Ian said of her new project: "I want people to walk out of the theatre the way that I want to walk out of the theatre, shattered. Or if it is a musical, I want to have at least one of the songs still running in my head."

As she conceives it, the musical would have to open "with a big bang, not some stupid song about a train and how much they're going to get to pack." And "it has to be done in a way that isn't all like 'save the whales.'"

This comes from the author of At Seventeen, the hit song whose lyrics sensitively and poignantly captured the pain and angst of being a teenager. Before that she also wrote Society's Child, and was publically feted at age 14 by Leonard Bernstein.

"Being Jewish is important to me," she told the Chronicle. "It is one of the few things I'd be prepared to die for." She said that her family lost everything "to either the Cossacks or the Germans."

Eye on Arts
By Bill Gladstone

Ian is a resident of Nashville, where she recently recorded a new CD, God and the FBI. She does not know when, or if, her planned show will ever reach Broadway.

2000 Toronto Fringe Festival the biggest one yet

By JOSEPH SERGE
Arts Editor

TORONTO — Over 100 independent theatre companies are participating in this year's Toronto Fringe Festival running July 6 to 16 in nine indoor venues in the city.

Carol Lempert

Among the plays this year are: Clever Evelyn (Or Mrs. Pickles and the Guide to Good Vacuuming); written and directed by Katrine Raymond and featuring Nick Gunz, Julie Bowring and nine-year-old Holly Skabarnicki-Scavone. A girl encounters many quirky characters on a fantastic journey in a fairy-tale world. At the Palmerston Library Theatre, 560 Palmerston Ave.

Julie Tepperman

Susan Freedman writes and performs in Fifty Seven and Still Lying About My Weight, directed by Jan Kudelka. In this 45-minute play, Freedman chronicles the ups and downs of the 50-something generation. At the Helen Gardiner Phelan Theatre, 79A St. George St.

Thornhill resident and George Brown Theatre School student Julie Tepperman adapted The Young Visiters, a 19th-century novella, for the stage. Tepperman narrates this story of a young girl who observes adults as she eagerly awaits the day she can discover love and romance as only she could imagine. At the St. Vladimir Theatre, 620 Spadina Ave (south of Harbord).

Breaking Legs! is a wry comedy about what goes on behind-the-scenes at the theatre. Written by Aphra Zimmerman, the play follows the misadventures of a company of seven theatre artists attempting to put together a production.

Also starring Tom Albrecht, Valeska Gonzalez and Richard Cronin. At the Poor Alex Theatre, 296 Brunswick Ave.

Susan Freedman

That Dorothy Parker's star Carol Lempert returns to The Fringe for The Camino: Walking the Pilgrim Road, the true story of a Toronto woman who – forced to take early retirement – walked 1,000 miles from Vezelay, France to Santiago, Spain on the legendary pilgrimage of St. James. Directed by Catherine Hayos. At the Robert Gill Theatre, 214 College St.

Alphonse, featuring Alon Nashman is especially suited for children. This award-winning play is about a boy who embaks on a coming-of-age pilgrimage. Written by Wajdi Mouawad and performed and directed by Nashman. The Courtyard Playground of the Bloor JCC, 750 Spadina Ave.

Amy Marschak

Matt Steinberg's play Prime Targets explores the reaction of a town and a country to a school shooting. Steinberg has just graduated from high school.

At the St. Vladimir Theatre, 620 Spadina Ave.

Monolith by Hart Massey explores life without faith. In the aftermath of a California earthquake a small island emerges. To secure peace and equality, cultural and religious identity are forbidden.

At the Ham Theatre at Artword Theatre, 75 Portland St.

Amy Marschak performs and stars in An Angel Cried A Tear Last Night, a one-woman play abut a Jewish girl's life, her optimism, her secret and surviving against the odds stacked against her.

Alon Nashman

Glen Morris Studio, 4 Glen Morris Street.

Former seamstress featured in Spadina doc

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Ruth Stein, a spry, 91-year-old grandmother, sewed dresses on Spadina Avenue and can now see herself featured in the film Needle 'n Tread, which the Toronto Jewish Film Society showed recently.

Born in Sachavola, Lithuania (now part of Poland), Stein had no idea that one day she would represent Spadina as it used to be. The five-minute documentary preceded the society's main attraction, Uncle Moses, featuring Maurice Schwartz.

Stein, who went to work on Spadina in 1926, still gets a pension of $9.95 a month from the Union of Needle Trades, Industrial and Textile Workers, and still owns a Singer sewing machine circa 1920.

With the aid of a walker, she goes up and down Eglinton Avenue from her retirement home in Pine Villa and comments perceptively on what she sees. But Stein can't recall the name of her first employers.

She expressed pleasure at seeing her image in the documentary made by David, her 30-year-old filmmaker grandson, who got the idea while working on an as-yet unfinished feature-length film, Neshoma, about the revival of Jewish culture everywhere.

In Needle 'n Tread, there are archival shots of Spadina Avenue sweatshops of the kind Stein worked in, but the film also has modern day scenes of her working in her beloved garden at her home on Joicey Boulevard, where she lived until congestive heart failure forced her to seek a retirement home in March this year.

Ecology and architecture combine in sunny Arizona

By SHEILA DROPKIN
Special to The CJN

SCOTTSDALE — Arizona is known for its many natural wonders, including its breathtaking mountains, a desert landscape with a wide variety of cacti and palo verde and olive trees, and delightful weather.

Among its manufactured wonders are the Cosanti and Arcosanti developments of Paoli Soleri, who is a native of Italy and resident of Arizona since 1956. Soleri is an architect, urban planner, lecturer and a noted designer of windbells, including a line called Cause Bells.

The bells are built, displayed and sold at Cosanti, a combination residence and craft centre located in the heart of Scottsdale's Paradise Valley, just north of Phoenix.

Soleri's home and studios are earthformed concrete architectural structures artistically placed here amidst courtyards, terraces and garden paths. A striking array of bronze and ceramic windbells is suspended throughout the area.

In the sales room, purchasers are invited to Ring a Bell for a Cause, from a display of close to 40 designs which represent issues of either national or global concern. Sixteen dollars of the retail price of each bell is directed to a specific cause selected by the customer from the posted list.

The causes are varied and include such diverse interests as the local United Jewish Appeal and Jewish Family and Child Service, Ronald McDonald House, an AIDS hospice, the Sierra Club, a literary group and the Arizona Save the Arts Foundation.

Every piece in the Cosanti collection is designed by Soleri and embellished by specially trained artisans. Visitors are encouraged to wander the grounds and watch the artisans at work.

The bronze windbells are created using the traditional bronze casting process enhanced by design techniques developed by Soleri. An aluminum bell pattern is packed in molding sand in a specially engineered box. When the pattern is removed, a bell impression is left. An original design and Cosanti Hallmark are then pressed into the sand mold.

Some of the bronze bells are life-size and affixed to special stands. Others are hung from hooks and trees. All of them are truly beautiful.

The ceramic windbells are made from a mixture of Arizona clay, commercial stoneware and water placed into Soleri-designed molds. Each earth-cast bell takes with it a little of the mold, which adds unique colour and texture. These, too, are displayed throughout the complex.

The bells make a unique conversation piece for any home or business. Many of them seem to cry out "touch me" and even the more conventional designs have an air of "aren't I special?" Which they are.

Prices are varied and the staff is very helpful. Bells are carefully packed for shipment to avoid breakage or scratching.

Arcosanti, a town now under development about 97 kilometres north of Phoenix, is Soleri's newest project. Archology is a term coined by the architect to describe his concept of architecture and ecology working together as an integral process to produce new urban habits.

When completed, Arcosanti will house 6,000 people by combining compact urban structures with large-scale solar greenhouses on 25 acres of a 4,000 acre preserve. In the artists' renderings, it looks like something out of the most futuristic movie imaginable. Proceeds from the sale of the windbells are being used to help fund the development.

While still in the early stages of construction, the Arcosanti concept and site have been around since 1970. In that time, thousands of students and professionals have attended seminars and workshops conducted there by Soleri and his staff.

The Music Centre is operational and offers a program of performing artists. Some overnight accommodations are also available, but since it's a short drive from Phoenix or Sedona, staying there is not necessary for the casual visitor.

Cosanti has been declared an Arizona Historic Site and Newsweek magazine has called Arcosanti "probably the most important experiment undertaken in our lifetime" as urban architecture.

Large turnout for Yiddish celebration

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Nearly 1,000 people celebrated 1,000 years of Yiddish in the world at a concert of Yiddish music and humour at Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Synagogue recently.

The sanctuary was full and the balcony nearly so, as cantors, singers and comedians combined to entertain an audience who relished each Yiddishe vort.

The concert, co-sponsored by the congregation and UJA FEDERATION, drew such a large crowd because the Yiddish language is reminding Jews of their heritage in extended families, said concert chair Deanie Rumack.

The combination of traditional songs with the lighter touch provided by comedian Michael Lebovic and singer/actor Gloria Valentine was the key in attracting so many people, Rumack told The CJN.

Most of those attending were grandchildren of Holocaust survivors who have learned to appreciate Yiddish from their bubbies and zaydes, Rumack said, but there were a significant number of survivors as well.

The seats were filled long before the concert began with Yiddish folk and popular melodies by the Zemer Chorale led by Charles Heller.

Cantor Louis Danto, cantor emeritus of Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda, was the next performer and his four selections alternately brought tears and smiles of recognition.

The same was true of songs by Cantor Aaron Bensoussan, the synagogue's chazzan, who served congregations in New York prior to coming to Toronto in 1999.

Despite his relative youth, Lebovic has mastered the inflections of the Jews who lived around him in Brooklyn. His performance of Der Briev Treyger by Dzigan and Schumacher, and A Briev fun Menachem Mendel by Sholem Aleichem underlined this ability.

As always, Valentine delighted with her singing of Shviger and other songs from Second Avenue and the Yiddish theatre. Her rendition of numbers by the Bagelman sisters (the Berry sisters of TV fame) brought a strong response from the audience.

Needle and Tread documents life on Spadina Avenue

She is also seen doing aerobic exercises at the Bathurst Jewish Centre, where she went by bus every day until she broke a knee two years ago.

The film opens with Adrienne Cooper of New York singing My Resting Place while the music of the Flying Bulgar Klezmer band and their version of the Three Seamstresses fills the soundtrack.

Stein's activities and work are contrasted with those of an Asiatic woman who now does the kind of work on Spadina Avenue that Stein did so long ago.

The documentary, sponsored by Friends of Yiddish among others, has been shown on Bravo TV and at the Toronto Jewish Film Festival last year.

David said that in preparing for Neshoma, he has so much good Toronto footage of the Ashkenaz parade and of the show Ghetto Tango that he could make four or five films.

"I'm still wrestling with how Neshoma will turn out, but it will be completed," he said.

Three years ago, David and his younger brother Eric, 27, leader of the klezmer band Beyond the Pale, visited and photographed his grandmother's home in Sachavola, and some of the footage will be in Neshoma.

They also did filming at Auschwitz and in their grandfather's home town. (Stein's husband, a cabinet maker, died in 1991.)

David describes Neshoma as a labour of love that he started with a grant of $4,000 from UJA, supplemented by $15,000 raised privately. It will feature some Toronto Holocaust survivors. He can be reached at 416-638-1373. Karen Shopsowitz is the co-producer.

Coast to Coast

Desperation usually brings mistakes

Last week, Canadian political news was dominated by one issue. The report, amplified in the media every day, concerning the revelation and subsequent fallout regarding the Canadian Alliance's (CA) overly aggressive membership recruitment drive in Quebec.

As the story unfolded, Tom Long came forward with a mea culpa and apologized for the 'zeal' displayed by his Quebec campaigners. However, much harm was already done.

Long's personal credibility as a leadership candidate was damaged as was the entire process surrounding the Canadian Alliance's leadership race.

Thinking themselves the prime beneficiaries of the CA woes, federal Tories watched from the sidelines and smiled gleefully. Those smiles faded when accusations began to surface suggesting that in part, Quebec Tories had a hand in the mess. This conspiracy theory sounded especially plausible since Tom Long had hired the head of Tory Senator Pierre Nolin's Quebec election team to lead the membership drive in La Belle Province.

All of a sudden, Tories now found themselves compelled to vindicate their actions in connection to a leadership race in the camp of their most bitter rival.

Not to be outdone by the inept Tories, Preston Manning plunged in head first, seemingly oblivious to the mounting storm around him.

Scene in Ottawa
By G.K. SIMCOE

The media revealed instructions from Manning to his Ontario campaigners to sign up as many new members as possible – even if they had no intention of supporting the Canadian Alliance in the future.

All three, Long, Nolin and Manning are victims of the same virus… desperation. And, as a result, all three ignored the self-evident truths within the media reports.

If one may be so bold, your faithful scribe has a suggestion for the Jewish community: learn the three-fold lesson of this news story.

The less than judicious political actions of one element within the Jewish community are bound to affect the credibility of the entire group. The inability to properly assess the impact of a political development will render the community unprepared to manage that development when it comes to visit its doorstep. Finally, the refusal to learn important lessons from a distance will result in paying the price up close.

More than 1,300 attend

Hurricane Carter headliner at Winnipeg sports dinner

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — The annual YMHA/Max and Rose Rady Jewish Community Centre's dinner, turned out to be the most successful in its 28-year history, thanks in large part to its star headliner, Rubin "Hurricane" Carter.

"We had 1,300 people at the dinner, and I would say the speaker had the most to do with it. We just happened to be in the right place," said Ken Kronson, chair and co-founder of the dinner.

Winnipeg sports fans turned out in record numbers to hear the Hurricane and to honour outstanding local athletes. Carter was a professional boxer whose career was cut short by a lengthy jail term for a crime he didn't commit. The story of his successful struggle for justice was told in the Academy Award nominated movie, Hurricane, which starred Denzel Washington.

Another evening highlight was selection of the athlete of the year. This year's winner of the Idy and Max Nusgart Memorial Award is top-ranked judoka Olia Berger. This is Berger's second time in the winner's circle; she also won the award in 1997.

Berger is the daughter of judo master Mark Berger, a Russian immigrant to Winnipeg who is also her coach. This past year, the younger Berger won the 2000 Canadian Senior championships. She also won the bronze medal at the United States Open Championship and placed seventh at the Belgian Open.

The other nominees were hockey players Aaron Shibou and Josh Hechter, and 11-year-old squash and badminton star David Glass.

In recognition of Y2K, the dinner committee announced two other awards: the Manitoba Jewish Builder and Athlete of the 20th Century. Among the nominees in the latter category included Mark Berger; championship curler Terry Braunstein; recently retired international racquetball star Sherman Greenfeld; former Winnipeg Blue Bomber centre George Druxman; blind athlete Shep Shell; basketball Manitoba Hall of Famer Gail Winston-Kendall; field hockey player Paula Parks; early 20th century boxer Abe Mantel; and sprinter Laurie Cohen.

The winner, Leible Hershfield, who died last year at age 89, was a dominant presence in Jewish athletic activities for much of the 20th century. In 1969 he was named the best Jewish athlete of the half century.

In high school, he was a track and field star, and in the 1920s, '30s and '40s, he built an impressive career in softball and soccer. He was also an accomplished gymnast, coached volleyball and basketball, and was a qualified swimming instructor. For decades, he was a fixture at the YMHA.

The builder of the 20th century winner was Sam Katz, founder, president and owner of the Winnipeg Goldeyes of the Northern Baseball League. In 1994, the club won the league championship in its inaugural season and it has made the finals every year since, even as the league has grown to 16 teams.

Katz was also involved in founding the Winnipeg Cyclone with Earl and Cheryl Barish. Earl Barish, one of the nominees in the builder category, is president of the International Basketball Association, the Cyclone's league, and is a pitcher in the B'nai Brith Men's Slow-Pitch League.

The other nominees in the builder category were Ben Hatskin, founder of the Winnipeg Jets of the old World Hockey Association (and a former Winnipeg Blue Bomber player) and Barry Shenkarow, president of the NHL Jets; G. Sydney Halter, the first commissioner of the Canadian Football League; Abe Kovnats, a longtime CFL official; Max Freed and Mark Danzker who brought the first Goldeyes baseball club to Winnipeg in 1954; Charlie Krupp who was involved in a wide variety of sports and has a local baseball field named after him; Dr. Neville Winograd who was a longtime member of the Blue Bomber executive and served as president of the CFL; and Ernie Nairn, a CBC sportscaster who has contributed a lot of time to amateur sports groups in Winnipeg.

JCC Maccabi Games gearing up

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — In mid-August, more than 160 Toronto-area youngsters will board a fleet of buses, and embark on two excellent athletic adventures that have become a staple of the summer sports calendar.

Sixty will head to Staten Island and 40 will travel to Cincinnati for the JCC Maccabi Games. They will join athletes from JCCs across North America and overseas for five days of friendly athletic competition. From Aug. 13-18 in Cincinnati, Toronto athletes will compete against young sportsmen and women from Los Angeles, San Francisco, Rochester, Israel and Venezuela. The Staten Island games are set for Aug. 20 to 25.

Toronto's contingent to Cincinnati includes boys and girls basketball teams, a boys baseball team, and two boys beach volleyball squads, said Grant Smith, head of the Toronto delegation. The athletes heading to Cincinnati will be 16 and under.

Age generally younger group will travel to Staten Island, Smith said. A hoops team consisting of boys aged 13-14; a 17-strong boys and girls swim team; six tennis players; seven golfers; a boys soccer team; and five track and field athletes (three boys, two girls) will compete at the New York venue.

Last year, Toronto came home with 70 medals

The team's boy-girl ratio is roughly 85-15. Although organizers tried to include more female competitors, Smith said it was difficult to find them. He speculated "the reason is that girls tend to go to camp and the times the games are held are the last week of camp."

Last year's girls softball team won't be back to defend their bronze medal, mostly because this year's competition is in Boca Raton, Florida, which is too far to send a team, Smith said. Other venues are in Tucson, Ariz. and Richmond, Va.

Montreal, Windsor, Hamilton, Calgary, Vancouver and Ottawa, in addition to Toronto, will be sending teams to the youth games.

Last year, the Toronto contingent came home with 70 medals, including a girls basketball gold and a boys baseball silver. The swim team alone captured 30 medals.

Smith said Maccabi Canada officials are planning to send a junior baseball team to the 2001 Maccabiah Games in Israel as well as boys and girls junior basketball teams. The youth games will give the athletes experience and allow team captains to gauge the strengths of the teams, he said.

Despite the hunt for medals, Smith points out "it's not only about winning. It's an athletic competition during the day and a cultural event at night."

Will our faith(s) define us?

As I was saying...

By RON CSILLAG

The Canadian Alliance's leadership race is not yet over, but the fight for the party's – indeed of Canada's – heart and soul is just starting.

In only three short months since its creation, the Alliance has succeeded, whether intentionally or not, in effecting a seismic shift of the political ground in this country. I, for one, find it all unsettling.

The charge was led by Stockwell Day, an ordained evangelical Christian minister and one-time lay pastor. It was Day who first played the religion card in the leadership campaign, using it as a wedge to hammer the Liberals on two old-fashioned issues: faith and family values – issues that rarely, if ever, crop up in Canadian politics.

Time was when social conservatism and its sub-group, the religious right, was considered an almost lunatic fringe in the secular world of Canadian politics, evoking uncomfortable memories (for Jews at least) of Duplessis-era anti-Semitism, Social Credit and hellfire Prairie populism.

Day, and to a lesser extent Preston Manning (also an ordained evangelical minister), have changed all that. Even more than the Reform party, the Alliance's blend of social and economic conservatism is anchored by a heavy dose of religious faith. The question is, whose religious faith?

On the stump, Day, to the seeming discomfort of the other contenders, was the most assertive in presenting himself as the traditional values candidate. He was steadfast in his opposition to abortion (as a member of Premier Ralph Klein's cabinet, he fought unsuccessfully to remove public funding of abortions); against expanded gay rights (in 1997, he termed homosexuality "a mental disorder"); and he lashed out at political-cultural permissiveness (Liberalism, he said, has contributed to the "breakdown of society.")

Did he sound a resonating chord? He seems to have, but ironically, it was among non-Protestant conservatives.

Day was particularly successful in reaching out to Muslims, Catholics, Sikhs, Hindus – groups typically associated with the Liberals – and some Orthodox Jews. At a meeting at Beth Jacob School for Girls, Day's team claimed to have signed up 400 Jewish members from the Orthodox community. Religious groups, often conservative in their own social values, were also drawn to Day by his promise of federal tax breaks for parents of children in religious schools.

"We touched a nerve with that," boasted Jason Kenney, a Canadian Alliance MP and Day's campaign chair. "The ethnic religious communities have heard Liberal rhetoric about diversity and pluralism for decades. But it's the Canadian Alliance that is getting serious about giving them what they want to protect culture, education and faith."

Really? I thought the Canadian Alliance's objective, like the Reform party's, is to abolish multiculturalism policies and do away with what Manning has always called "hyphenated" Canadians.

Or maybe the Alliance didn't change anything. Maybe it tapped into a growing moral conservatism in this country.

We tend to associate the political influence of the religious right with American politics. But consider the findings of American academic Dennis Hoover, a watcher of religion in Canada. A study by Hoover has shown that between 1984 and 1999, conservative Christian groups participated in an average 55 percent of constitutional rights litigation in Canada. The figure for U.S. groups is 50 percent.

John English, a University of Waterloo history professor and former Liberal MP, is warning that a tectonic shift is quietly occurring in Canadian politics, one that may advance the values of the Canadian Alliance and mimic American politics.

"Is Canada, a country where most Canadians now wear their faiths very lightly, prepared for a century where faiths define one's place and identity?" he asks.

Jewish history holds the answer to that.

CHICKEN WITH 40 CLOVES OF GARLIC

THIS RECIPE BROUGHT TO YOU BY..

HERB CAPLAN

WE SELL JENN-AIR FOR LESS

1111 Weston Road (S. of Eglinton) 767-1655

www.caplanappliances.com

4 heads garlic, yielding 40 cloves
2 tblsp. + 1/2 cup olive oil salt & freshly ground pepper
1/2 tsp sugar
1 4 lb. chicken
2 tblsp chopped parsley
2 tblsp chopped fresh chives
2 tblsp chopped fresh basil
1 tblsp chopped fresh thyme
1 tblsp chopped cilantro
1 tblsp chopped fresh chervil
1/2 bay leaf

Preheat oven to 425°F. Separate but do not peel the cloves of garlic. Combine the 2 tblsps olive oil, salt, pepper and sugar. Roll garlic cloves in mixture and set aside.

Place remaining 1/2 cup olive oil in Dutch oven, reserving a little to sprinkle over chicken. Place chicken in Dutch oven, then sprinkle olive oil, salt and pepper over top. Place garlic around chicken. Mix parsley, chives, basil, thyme, cilantro, chervil and bay leaf. Sprinkle over chicken.

Cover and bake for 1 hour. Remove bay leaf and serve. Serves 6.

About Seniors

Dr. Mark says...

It isn't exactly news that Canada, and especially its Jewish community, is aging. We've known this fact for decades, and over the last 10 years, the figures have sharpened. In 1951, a year after I was born, seniors made up only 7.8 percent of the country's population. By 1999, this figure had grown to around 12 percent, and by 2010 will reach nearly 15 percent.

Of course, these figures point to great successes — in public hygiene, in the decrease in cardiovascular deaths, and so on. However, what has been of interest, is not whether we are producing more older Canadians, but whether we are seeing a healthier and less dysfunctional elder. Or could it be that our "successes" in geriatric longevity have produced a number of ever more dependent elders, overwhelming both their caregivers and the formal health-care system?

Nearly two decades ago, a debate began after an article titled Aging, Natural Death and the Compression of Mortality, was published in the New England Journal of Medicine. In this piece, the commonly held notion that an aging population necessarily resulted in an increased burden of disability and functional loss among those elderly who survived into old age, was challenged.

It was hypothesized that we were observing a "squaring of the mortality curve," with most deaths occurring, after only a brief period of disability, in the late 70s and early 80s. The authors hypothesized that if the age of disability approximated the age of death, we would observe a decrease in disability in the "old-old." In other words, the elderly would live in health and independence into a ripe old age and then die.

Optimistically, the authors concluded: "Smoking, body-mass index and exercise patterns in midlife and late adulthood are predictors of subsequent disability. Not only do persons with better health habits survive longer, but in such persons, disability is postponed and compressed into fewer years at the end of life."

While exciting, these ideas are not exactly new. For example, take the 1903 Nobel Laureate in Medicine, Elie Metchnikoff: "Old age will be postponed so much that men of 60 to 70 years of age will retain their vigour and will not require assistance."

Let us hope, although separated by a century, that both authors are right. But we must wait just a few years to come to a conclusion.

Max to the Devils

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — It's not often that a third-round pick in the NHL entry draft is interviewed by the New York Times and is featured in numerous television, radio and newspaper stories as well. Then again, it's not every day that an Israeli playing Tier II Junior hockey gets drafted by the NHL's Stanley Cup champions.

Max Birbraer

For Max Birbraer, the last few months have been an emotional whirlwind, with one remarkable accomplishment following another.

First he has another great year toiling in the Ontario Hockey Association (OHA), a junior circuit that is considered a route to a college career, not the NHL. Then he flies to Iceland, where he's a dominant force helping Israel win its first ever gold medal in IIHF Pool D competition. NHL Central Scouting likes what it sees and ranks him 41st among North American prospects. The Hockey News rates him 79th overall.

On draft day, Birbraer, 19, gets to experience every young hockey player's dream come true. The New Jersey Devils, known for their keen evaluation of young talent, select him early in the third round, 67th overall. Birbraer, who grew up in Kazakhstan, becomes only the second player ever, after Danius Zubrus, to be drafted by the NHL out of Tier II Junior hockey.

Syria wants to talk

By DANIEL SOBELMAN
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Official sources in Damascus were quoted twice last week as saying that talks with Israel could resume in August.

Writing for the Lebanese newspaper a-Nahar, Syrian journalist T'ana al-Amam quoted official Damascus sources as expressing optimism on the chance of resuming peace talks with Israel as early as this August.

Bashar Assad sets condition

According to the sources, al-Amam said the resumption is conditional on Prime Minister Ehud Barak's accepting that President Bashar Assad will stand firm on Syria's territorial demands, "especially on the return of Syria to the north-eastern shore of the Kinneret."

However, the sources added that "the question of water will remain open for discussion."

In the past week, Syrian media have renewed calls for Israel to renew peace talks – these increased as Assad and Foreign Minister Farouq Shara said Damascus is willing to resume talks "at any moment."

Last week, the Syrian newspaper al-Hayat reported that U.S. Secretary of State Madeleine Albright would arrive in Damascus on July 25 for talks with Assad and the Syrian leadership on the possibility of renewed talks. Official sources told the newspaper that at the end of May and beginning of June, the U.S. administration presented compromise proposals to Damascus "that were good for both sides."

The Syrians actually began expressing optimism in the middle of May, saying that a breakthrough in the peace process was expected in "coming weeks." Sources then noted that an agreement could be reached regarding the north-eastern shore of the Kinneret without compromising Israel's water requirements.

The News in Brief

CANADA

Diplomat Arrested

TORONTO — A former Canadian diplomat in Israel was arrested by RCMP officers and charged with smuggling $1 million worth of cocaine into Israel. Douglas Wardle, who was stationed at the Canadian Embassy in Tel Aviv in 1996, is charged with conspiracy to import, and importing and trafficking 8.5 kilograms of cocaine. Wardle, 42, was released on a $50,000 bond. He will appear in court Aug. 11 to enter a plea. Wardle was recalled to Ottawa in 1996 when Israeli authorities implicated him in a drug smuggling ring but could not arrest him because of his diplomatic immunity. If convicted, Wardle faces a possible life sentence.

ISRAEL

Investment Doubles

JERUSALEM — Foreign investment in Israel totalled $4.31 billion (US) during the first five months of the year, compared with $2.06 billion during the same period in 1999, according to the Bank of Israel. For all of 1999, foreign investment totalled $4.85 billion, the bank said.

Gay Pride

TEL AVIV — Thousands of Israelis took part in the annual gay pride parade here June 23. Rabin Square was lined with Israeli flags and bedecked with the rainbow banners of the country's growing gay pride movement.

WORLD

Doctor's Trial

VIENNA — A retired Austrian neurologist accused of Nazi war crimes is too ill to stand trial, according to a psychiatric report commissioned by the prosecution. Heinrich Gross, 84, was charged last year with complicity in the murder of nine children at a Vienna clinic during World War II. In March, the judge stopped the trial just 20 minutes after it began, when a psychiatrist testified that Gross is suffering from dementia.

Dire Predictions

MOSCOW — A Russian Jewish media tycoon expects the Kremlin to take further steps against him and other Russian Jews who criticize President Vladimir Putin. Freed several days after he was jailed earlier this month, Vladimir Goussinsky made the prediction in a letter to the World Jewish Congress. Goussinsky owns Russia's only independent television station and is leader of the Russian Jewish Congress.

Insurer to Pay...

ROME — Italy's largest insurer agreed to pay $150 million in Holocaust-era claims, according to the World Jewish Congress. The group also said Assicurazioni Generali agreed to provide access to its archives and to publish the names of more than 20,000 policy holders.

Deadline for Others...

NEW YORK — U.S. public financial officials have given Austrian insurers until July 14 to explain why they have not joined a global effort to settle Holocaust-era claims. The U.S. officials did not say what they would do if the insurers missed the deadline.

Allies Had Data

WASHINGTON — Allied intelligence agents had information in 1943 that could have been used to save some Italian Jews from a Nazi roundup, according to U.S. historians. The disclosure was made last week, when officials at the U.S. National Archives released some 400,000 pages of declassified World War II documents.

Czech Property

PRAGUE — The Czech Senate voted overwhelmingly last week to return Jewish property confiscated during the Nazi occupation. The bill, already passed by the lower chamber of parliament, now awaits President Vaclav Havel's signature.

Kohl Sounds Off

BERLIN — A controversy erupted in Germany late last month after former Chancellor Helmut Kohl compared his treatment by the governing party to the Nazi persecution of the Jews. Other politicians lashed out at him after Kohl said that calls by a leading Social Democrat to boycott his fundraising efforts resembled the Nazi-era boycott of Jewish shops.

Money Laundering

PARIS — Israel features prominently on a list of 15 countries which "encourage money laundering," according to a report leaked to the French daily Le Monde. The list was originally compiled by a special investigative committee set up by the G-7 group of industrialized countries. As a consequence of its appearance on the list, Israel may face international sanctions in the coming months.

Jewish Groups: Settle German Bank's Role

OTTAWA — The German bank accused of once holding accounts for members of Adolf Hitler's dreaded SS is planning to open a branch in Canada, but Jewish groups want the federal government to block the deal until all outstanding claims over the bank's role in World War II are settled.

Frankfurt-based Dresdner Bank AG, Germany's third-largest bank, recently applied to Canada's Superintendent of Financial Institutions for permission to open a branch in Toronto.

Dresdner is part of a group of German industrial giants negotiating to settle enormous class-action lawsuits filed by Holocaust survivors and their families over the use of slave labour and the laundering of money looted from Jews during the war.

Canadian Jewish Congress and B'nai Brith Canada say restitution from German industries should be resolved before the branch of Dresdner Bank is allowed to operate freely in Canada.

The Jewish groups say this is an emotionally charged issue from which the government should not look away.

CHAT expands northward for grade 9 students

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The 200 Grade 9 students who will start their CHAT careers at the new Richmond Hill campus will have an "unusual and rare opportunity to help shape their school," according to headmaster Paul Shaviv.

"After a few days, they will come home saying it's fantastic. After graduation, they will say that they had a first class high school experience," he said.

"There is no way that they will get the full benefit of the CHAT high school experience, and nothing CHAT can say will make it different," counters Fran Garshowitz, whose daughter, Paula, is scheduled to enter Grade 9 in September.

At the parents' information meeting, spokespeople "promoted the ruach, the school spirit, the camaraderie," she said. Speaking as an "education consumer," Garshowitz said, "that's what I bought."

It's like buying a house, and then finding out a week before the deal closes that while you will have a house, it is in a different location and with a different layout, she said.

High school is a "last fling," before the realities of adult life, added parent Gerri Holder. She remembers at the information night being promised "school spirit, warmth, and the school programs. That just won't happen."

At issue is CHAT's decision to lease space for a York Region campus at the newly vacant Richmond Hill High School, just north of Major Mackenzie between Bathurst and Yonge streets. Those incoming Grade 9 students who live north of Steeles will attend that facility.

Over the five years of the lease, the school will grow to serve grades 9 to 12, Shaviv said. It will offer a full academic and extra-curricular program, he promised.

Unlike the Wilmington campus, which was adapted from an elementary school, Shaviv said, Richmond Hill High School was built as a high school. "It is an outstanding facility, with labs, flexible rooms, a large field for sports, and space for a library."

There will be an expert team of teachers, who will be imparters of the CHAT ethos, Shaviv said. He described the principal, whose name he could not yet divulge, as "a veteran CHAT staff member with a community-wide reputation."

The decision to use the northern facility was made literally in a matter of days, Shaviv said.

Last November, the intention was to continue its building program at the Wilmington campus. It became apparent, however, that community objections to expansion were so strong that this would not happen.

Several possible sites were considered, most seriously the lower level of next-door Beth Jacob v'Anshe Drildz Synagogue, which could have been turned into classrooms.

This solution to the admittedly overcrowded school was "inadequate and inferior," said Shaviv, who added that it would have brought the school "to absolute capacity."

CHAT became aware of the empty high school on Wednesday, June 14 and made a formal request to lease it on Friday, June 16.

"I got home seven minutes before Shabbat," Shaviv said ruefully.

On June 19 it was presented to "a full attendance of the board," who unanimously authorized the five-year lease.

For the first year, students will be bused from a central Thornhill location to the new school. Consideration is being given to also accommodating parents who live outside the Bathurst corridor.

The only exceptions, Shaviv said, are the dozen or so special education students in each year who will remain at Wilmington, and those for whom there is a clear compassionate need to not split the family up, such as illness.

This will be decided on a case by case basis, Shaviv said.

While calling this "the best solution for the kids and for the school," Shaviv and the board call it only "an interim solution to our problems of site overcrowding."

The intention is still to build in the planned community campus slated for Bathurst and Rutherford.

Addressing parental concerns about students going to school with the same people they had been with all along, rather than having the opportunity to make new friends, Shaviv said that there is an almost 50 percent split between youngsters from north and from south of Steeles.

"There will be a healthy mix of kids. All the feeder schools are represented [in both schools]."

An information meeting for interested parents will be held on July 4 at the CHAT Wilmington building.

School president Baila Lubek said she preferred to not comment to the press until plans are finalized.

CLARIFICATION

In the article, "New Group offers support to women with cancer" (CJN, June 29), it may appear that the volunteer database will be made available to women newly diagnosed with cancer. L'Chaim wants to make it known that there is a database of women willing to act as support, not that the database itself will be made public. Privacy is a key element of the service this support group offers.

Getting to a state of unity

From the editor's desk

As of this writing, Israeli police have not apprehended anyone in the attempted torching two weeks ago, of Yaar Ramot, a Conservative synagogue in Jerusalem, but they are searching for Jewish perpetrators.

The general mood of the people in Israel was painfully expressed last week by an editorial in Ha'aretz. "It is difficult to shake off the oppressive feeling aroused by the sight of burned books on the scorched floor of a synagogue, and it is difficult not to recall similar sights at terrifying events that occurred at other places and during other times in the history of the Jewish people.

"The burning of a synagogue is a horrific symbol... We must not underestimate the impact of the reports of the events in Israel on Jewish communities everywhere..."

The writer was absolutely correct.

It is even difficult to write the words let alone imagine them: one Jew trying to burn down another Jew's shul and the twisted religious loyalty that attempts to glorify God's name by burning His sefer Torah, His prayer books and His place of worship.

It was with these sad and angry emotions still squeezing at my throat, that a copy of an address by Prof. Moshe Kaveh, the president of Bar Ilan University came across my desk. Titled The Urgent Search for Jewish Unity, it was delivered in Cleveland at the beginning of the year.

The remarks arrived at the right time. Their subject is precisely what needs to be discussed in the wake of the attempted arson of Yaar Ramot. Moreover, Prof. Kaveh, observant, a physicist, is not shy about applying his scientific training and outlook in offering a formula "to reduce the dangerous gaps in the Jewish world."

The address begins with a brief description of the current stresses tearing at Israeli society, or as Kaveh calls them, "the dangerous gaps". He also provides both a thumbnail historical and theological context for those stresses.

Kaveh has an engaging style of presentation. He speaks forcefully and forthrightly, openly confident of the correctness of his opinions, for example: "Today, the most important task that faces us is to find a recipe to overcome unbridled hatred. We need halachic wisdom to help develop a stable society whose basic values are shared by those who keep kosher and those who don't, by the young people in the cafés of Tel Aviv and the yeshiva scholars.

"I believe this recipe can be found in three basic rules, three halachic principles. If we start from scratch and create a Jewish people who subscribe to these rules, then we can save the Jewish people. If we had obeyed these rules for the last 2,000 years, we wouldn't be in the situation that we are today."

Those are very confident, assertive words, and refreshing because of the place whence they stem, deep conviction, the heart of a pious, moderate, scholar/scientist for whom the well-being of the people of Israel is among life's highest pursuits.

Moshe Kaveh

What is Kaveh's recipe? I reproduce his own words. He states various propositions and then elaborates. Due to space limitations however, I can only publish very brief excerpts of his compelling thesis.

"The first rule of Jewish life should be the primacy of klal Yisrael, the community of Israel... I believe there is nothing more important."

Kaveh elaborates: "Right now in Israel, we teach our children to die for klal Yisrael but not to live for it. We do not teach them how to devote themselves to making sure klal Yisrael is preserved in times of peace as well as in times of war."

His second rule for Jewish life today is "kevod habriot, which means respect for the living and sensitivity to human values. Kevod habriot is one of the most important concepts in Jewish life. If God created the human being in his image, you should respect that to such an extent that it supersedes most of the mitzvot [commandments].

"Just imagine the revolution, the Jewish revolution, that would take place if you told the younger generation that respecting others, treating others decently, is more important than hundreds of mitzvot. Imagine how that would transform the religious kids and how it would make our tradition more meaningful to secular kids."

Kaveh articulates the third rule with similar unequivocal force. "When you have a confrontation between peace and the truth, peace is more important. We have examples of this principle directly from God. The Torah tells us that God deviated from the truth when he wanted peace between Abraham and Sarah. You can see throughout the Bible and the Talmud, that peace is more important than truth."

No words can improve on Kaveh's own. "We need to bring my three basic Jewish rules of life to our schools, to our children. With these rules, a new generation of Jews will learn how to respect one another and will learn the importance of community. The three rules should form the common denominator for the Jewish people..."

Kaveh's Cleveland speech is an important document. It should be read by as many people as possible. Adherence to his three rules would have made impossible and inconceivable the torching of Yaar Ramot.

Survivors' memories affect living, dying, conference told

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Holocaust survivors' experience with severe trauma influences the way they live and die, says the co-ordinator of the Jewish Hospice Program, a home-centred palliative care program.

"Because of the brutal deaths they have seen, they are often very frightened of dying," says Sheila Walker, a participant in a recent conference on memory and trauma sponsored in part by the Holocaust Education and Memorial Centre of Toronto UJA FEDERATION; Jewish Family & Child Services, Toronto Child Abuse Centre; and York Region Abuse Program.

Dying signifies a lack of control, says Walker, and that is very scary for people who, at one time, had to have complete control over their lives in order to survive.

Separation is also "a huge issue for Holocaust survivors because most of them were torn away from their families during the war," says Walker. She adds that survivors who are dying "often say that they did not have one happy day since they were diagnosed with a fatal illness."

Blanche Wiseman, a conference participant who works at JF&CS and the Bernard Betel Centre for Creative Living, says Holocaust survivors' history affects them throughout their lives. "There is always a part of them that is held back," she says. "Their joy of living has been contaminated" and they are continuously "flooded with feelings of loss or horror."

Survivors feel a need to hang on to their sadness, says Wiseman, and this often comes out in a form of anger that is not easily understood. "These feelings surface in times of illness. Hearing innocent terms such as 'experimental surgery' or 'collaboration' can evoke terrible memories. Some people even refuse to wear hospital bracelets or take showers."

As Holocaust survivors get older, Wiseman says "memories often come flooding back [because] they have more time to think." As a result, the children of survivors often become their parents' caregivers. When grown children see "the role of their parents change...they feel responsible for them. When their parents are dying, children suddenly feel powerless."

There are methods for survivors to cope with their trauma. Alan Bardikoff, a registered psychologist and conference organizer who volunteers with the Holocaust centre, suggests "Holocaust survivors could offer advice to other survivors of horrible events," such as abused children."We feel that people who experience trauma as children may feel a connection with each other."

War crimes effort falls short of goals

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A government pledge to launch 14 new Nazi-era war crimes cases is falling far short of its goal, a ministry report indicated last week.

So far, only three new proceedings have been commenced since July 1998 when the government announced a three-year, 14-case target. At the time, $46.8 million was allocated for the effort against both Nazi and modern-day war criminals.

"Given the time that has passed and with each passing year the deterioration in the evidence because of age and passing of suspects and witnesses, the ability to bring forward cases in the numbers we had anticipated is challenged," said Terry Beitner, acting director of the Justice Department's War Crimes Section.

The report, titled Canada's War Crimes Program, 3rd Annual Report 1999-2000, is a joint publication of the Department of Justice and the Department of Citizenship and Immigration. It surveys the government's efforts against Nazi war criminals as well as modern day war criminals.

The document states the Justice Department's War Crimes Section is working on 82 World War II files and it has undertaken initial checks on approximately 147 other cases.

Beitner said the unit has worked hard to bring cases to trial. "At this point, it's difficult to provide an estimate of numbers" of anticipated new cases. "I could tell you that in the next year, I intend to bring forward several cases."

The report noted that since 1995, federal authorities have initiated 17 citizenship revocation and deportation proceedings.

The report indicated the experience developed in addressing Nazi-era cases has proven valuable in dealing with modern day war criminals. Following creation of a dedicated Modern War Crimes Program, 581 applicants were refused entry to Canada in 1999 – an increase of 274 over the year before. Thirty-eight persons were removed from Canada in 1999-2000.

Canadian Jewish Congress president Moshe Ronen said "it's clear the same determination on modern day war criminals is not being placed on Nazi war criminals... The government seems focused locally and internationally on the modern war criminals issue. We have always said that for Canada to be seen in the vanguard of morality and justice, it must first look to its own backyard."

Reclaim partnership with God, says Rabbi Riskin

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Religious Zionists must return to the ideal that Jews are partners with God, not passive recipients of His bounty, says Rabbi Shlomo Riskin.

In this way, the rabbi said, they will overcome the crisis that is leading to "young religious Zionists taking off their kippot srugot [the knitted kippot considered the identifying symbol of the ideology]."

Rabbi Shlomo Riskin

Rabbi Riskin, who is the spiritual leader of the community of Efrat in the Territories in Israel and chancellor of Ohr Torah Stone Colleges and Graduate Programs, was speaking here at Yeshivat Or Chaim on Almore Avenue.

The kippah sruga was once a sign of tremendous pride in Israel, Rabbi Riskin said. Now, however, there is a "disease" he said, which he called "haredi-phobia."

"Many wearers of the kippah sruga are scared that the haredim are taking over."

This attitude is not entirely without basis, he said, noting that in the last election, the haredi Shas and Agudah parties together got 21 or 22 seats, as opposed to the religious Zionist Mafdal's four or five seats.

We must 'redeem the soul of the Jewish people'

The issue, he said, is whether Jews are partners with God in bringing the redemption, which includes establishing and maintaining a state, or whether they are relying on God to act miraculously.

After the rebellion of Bar Kochba in 132 CE, which led to the death of thousands of Jews, Rabbi Riskin explained, Rabbi Yochanan Ben Zachai made a bargain with the Roman general (later emperor) Vespasian. He and his scholars would abandon Jerusalem in favour of a religious centre in Yavneh.

"He felt that it was necessary to sacrifice political leadership and national sovereignty, in order to maintain the covenant of Judaism," said Rabbi Riskin.

This attitude was maintained by the religious establishment in Europe, which until this century was opposed to Zionism.

But, he said, "Jewish theology doesn't leave anything important to God. When it comes to health or sustenance, we do what we have to do [such as going to doctors, or getting an education] and then rely on God. Why is Jerusalem any different?"

When the Haskalah (Enlightenment) led to the development of nationalism and secularism and a serious increase in anti-Semitism, "far-sighted Jews realized that without a state, the Jewish people wouldn't survive."

The rules changed, the rabbi said. "Religious Zionists broke with the halachic directive to not wage war to wrest Jerusalem."

Rabbi Riskin described the "heady days for religious Zionism," particularly from the Six Day War until the early 1980s, when "the greatest heroes – and the greatest casualties – were the yeshivat hesder soldiers; when settler was not a term of insult, when we were back to the biblical heartland; when we were at the forefront of Jewish action."

The radiance dimmed, as the rabbi put it, with the intifadah and with the religious extremism that included the fanatic behaviour of Baruch Goldstein and Yigal Amir.

"If you are using your energy on the settlements, on dealing with the intifadah and liberating land, it is hard to have the energy to worry about the soul of the country," Rabbi Riskin said.

The settlers were seen as being opposed to peace, and the kippah was not a source of pride, he lamented. "The media respect us less, and we respect ourselves less."

Repeating a statement that he has made frequently – that he would accept giving back land in exchange for peace if the Israeli Jews voted that way in a referendum – he said Jews should not focus on what we don't have, but on what we do have.

"If [after a referendum] we are left even with settlement blocks, we have much more than we ever dreamed we would have."

The accomplishments of the state economically, sociologically (moulding people of all colours and nationalities into one nation), the number of people studying Torah, the fact that even the haredi Shas accept the concept of religious Zionists and that the haredim are going into the army and into the computer world, "redounds to the success of religious Zionists," he said.

Now, we must "redeem the soul of the Jewish people," Rabbi Riskin said. "We must establish yeshivot, not in Shilo [on the Golan], but in Tel Aviv. We must instil Jewish culture and values in secular schools."

Every generation has its challenges, he said. "We just must keep faith."

Panel recommends tackling hate on the Internet

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A high-profile review panel has recommended that the Canadian Human Rights Act (CHRA) be updated to keep pace with the use of the Internet as a medium for the transmission of hate messages.

The panel, headed by former Supreme Court of Canada Judge Gerard La Forest, made four recommendations on combatting Internet hate as part of a much broader package of proposed changes to Canada's human rights legislation.

The panel's 178-page report, titled Promoting Equality: A New Vision 2000, addresses issues like discrimination on the basis of genetic testing and bias against the poor.

In its four-page section on the Internet, the report proposes developing a code of practice for Internet users and widening the scope of the Act to address future telecommunications technologies.

The panel's two other recommendations are more controversial. It suggests service providers could be found liable for the content transmitted by its customers and it would empower a human rights tribunal to order an ISP to refuse service to one of its clients.

An ISP's liability would be "based on the extent of its knowledge and technological ability to take measures to prevent future breaches of the act," the report stated.

"We considered whether this degree of liability runs contrary to the policy in the Act that provides that the owner or operator of a telecommunications undertaking is not liable merely because its facilities are being used. We do not think it does," the panel stated.

"The proposal of liability is based on more than the passive provision of facilities for disseminating hate messages. It would require knowledge, actual or constructive, that its facilities were being used for a breach of the Act."

The Canadian Association of Internet Providers (CAIP), a voluntary industry group, took issue with two of the panel's recommendations.

"Unfortunately, [panel members] are somewhat misguided and impractical," said Jay Thomson, president of CAIP. "The panel feels that by targeting ISP's, they will be able to solve the problem."

The ISP industry realizes the Internet can be used to disseminate hate propaganda and other offensive material, although currently there are "few if any hate sites hosted in Canada" Thomson said.

CAIP has developed its own voluntary code of conduct and "is working with government and with interested stakeholders to address the issue…It's better we work with interested stakeholders than to respond to government fiat," Thomson said.

He also suggested the panel's recommendations are vague and unenforceable. "What does 'knowledge' mean?" he asked.

"What does an ISP have to do to have knowledge? Does this require a service provider to monitor all the communications going on over their network? That's impractical," he said."How can ISP's know everything that happens on their net?"

He pointed out the World Wide Web consists of millions of pages of content and the rest of the Internet, which includes e-mail, chat rooms and LISTSERV's, also contains an enormous amount of material being transmitted daily.

Thomson questioned whether a government agency could legally order an ISP to refuse service to a customer, but "even if it's legal for an agency to tell a company not to deal with a person, I don't see how that can work. People can change their identity, their name, their address."

Canadian Jewish Congress took a different view of the report's recommendations. The panel "has picked up the ball and we find that encouraging and a positive step forward," said Manuel Prutschi, national director of community relations for Congress.

The panel's recommendations coincide with efforts by the federal government and NGO's to address hate on the Internet.

Congress, along with CAIP, the Canadian Human Rights Commission, Industry Canada, the Media Awareness Network, the Canadian Heritage Ministry and the Canadian Anti-Racism Education and Research Society, are part of a "new media working group" studying the issue under the auspices of the Secretary of State for Multiculturalism, Prutschi said.

Part of proposed changes to human rights legislation

The group recently held its sixth meeting since February. "The issue of hate and bias on the Internet and its regulation is still a work in progress," he said. "There hasn't been an ultimate determination regarding legislative regulation, but there is no question the group agrees it should be regulated."

The group has also considered the concept of a hotline, similar to Crime Stoppers, that would give the public a central location to complain about Internet hate propaganda.

Congress, meanwhile, is preparing an option paper on Internet hate to be released in the fall while an inter-departmental government committee is examining other objectionable content on the Internet, like pornography, Prutschi said.

It all points to a move to regulate the Web and other parts of the Internet, he concluded.

Can he choose statecraft, diplomacy and peace?

U.S. Secretary of State Madeleine Albright returned to Washington last week after a one-day visit to Jerusalem, disappointed that the atmosphere between Israel and the PA was menacing, like a hovering, dark cloud ready to erupt in storm. Her report to President Bill Clinton could hardly have been an optimistic one. The question of whether to proceed with a three-way summit was less relevant than the larger question of whether the area would soon erupt in violence.

How could the atmosphere have been anything but menacing? The week began with a barrage of threats directed at Israel by Yasser Arafat.

"We have a few weeks left ahead of us," Arafat told thousands of cheering members of his Fatah movement in Nablus last Monday, "but they are the most important and critical, because at the end of it we will declare statehood... We remind them we cannot be threatened."

The latter statement was directed to IDF chief of staff Shaul Mofaz, who had earlier speculated that the IDF would have to use tanks and helicopters to quell the riots that would certainly erupt if the PA unilaterally declared its independent Palestinian state sometime after Sept. 13.

Once again, Arafat had resorted to his most predictable and sinister instrument of leadership: incitement.

The Israelis and the Palestinians are at a watershed in negotiations. Several issues remain unresolved, the two key ones being the competing claims upon Jerusalem and the status of the Jewish communities in the West Bank. As time passes and the issues remain unresolved, the two sides must be extra cautious, not less so, to ensure that the relationship between them remains firm and that extremists do not foment even greater anxiety among the two peoples.Thus it causes great disappointment, worry and suspicion that Arafat chooses constantly to deal with the need to abate the level of anxiety by creating even more.

As Israel's Justice Minister Yossi Beilin noted: "I regret he [Arafat] stirs up the masses with violent statements as we come close to the moment of truth. But there is no doubt... we are in the final few weeks or months during which the future of the Middle East will be determined."

The Yediot Achronot reported that Prime Minister Ehud Barak told Albright that Israel would annex the territories it controls "without waiting even one minute" if Arafat declared a state unilaterally. Why should he do otherwise? Indeed annexation would be the very least response expected of Israel's prime minister in a situation rendered anarchic and violent by the leader of the Palestinians.

Yasser Arafat must choose which course he prefers for his people. Can he once and for all abjure incitement, demagoguery and violence? Conversely, can he once and for all embrace statecraft, diplomacy and peace? The time is fast approaching when he will finally show us.

Trade show weak in geography

I recently attended the world's largest printing industry trade show – in Germany. There was a substantial Israeli presence at the show, thanks to Israel's growing importance in the high-tech aspects of modern printing.

Heidelberg, the world's largest manufacturer of commercial printing presses, had areas where company representatives could get together with printers from different parts of the world. There was a North American zone, a couple of European zones, an Asian zone, and so on.

Curiously, Israeli customers were not directed to the European, Asian, or Middle Eastern zones. Instead, they were directed to the area for South America and the Caribbean.

Does Heidelberg need a geography lesson? Perhaps a political lesson would do. Or has Israel miraculously been transported thousands of miles from the shores of the Mediterranean?

Resurrect interest in Yiddish

"Stratford's Fiddler superb" (CJN, June 22) should become a wake-up call for present generations of Jewry to try to remember that it was not a stork of any kind that brought them the present-day Jewish-Paradise-On-Earth freedom, liberty, and almost equality, in North America.

Inhibition and fear have contributed to the nearly total disappearance of the Yiddish language. That has been the gratitude paid to the Tevyas and his contemporaries by their descendants.

Shame on us that we have not only tolerated the virtual disappearance of Yiddish, but have done very little, if anything, to stop the language from being treated with a sense of disdain.

Those of us who still speak and understand the language know well its great profundity.

What better vehicle than The CJN, which reaches right across Canada, to begin a campaign to rectify this sad situation? Scholarship funds can be raised in communities for resurrecting interest in Yiddish.

All of this would help inject more of a feeling of pride in who and what we are. Most important of all, it would repay those Jews who had the courage and the stamina to lay the foundations on which was built what is now the Jewish community of North America.

Seeking volunteers for study

I am studying for my PhD in clinical psychology at Fairleigh Dickinson University in New Jersey.

Currently, I am working on my dissertation on Jewish families' psychology, beliefs, and reaction to the Holocaust. I am seeking Jewish adults (both survivors and non-survivors, the latter of whom will comprise the "control" or comparison group) to participate in this project.

Participation involves filling out an anonymous, multiple-choice questionnaire; there is no personal interview for this study. Those who are interested in volunteering or who would like more information about the study can contact me via e-mail at: ibreslau@yahoo.com or by phone at 212-580-0204.

Supports Chomsky and Said tributes

The opposition of the organized Jewish community to the granting of honorary degrees (by the University of Toronto) to Noam Chomsky and Edward Said is truly reminiscent of fascism. Whatever one thinks of either man, they are both certainly brilliant scholars who have provided a much-needed alternative to the pro-Israel bias of government policy, the mainstream media and scholarship. It is appalling to see Jews, for years among the leading advocates of civil liberties and freedom of speech, as the leading advocates of limitation of civil liberties for the supposed greater good.

Must oppose discrimination

According to the UJA FEDERATION supplement in The CJN June 20, more than $8 million dollars of the $33 million dollars available for allocation is used to provide a Jewish day school education to students in need. That is 25 percent of the total amount available. This percentage is relatively the same year in and year out.

Why does the Jewish community spend so much on Jewish education? Because we believe that without that education, the continuity of our community is at risk.

Let me ask again: Why does the Jewish community spend so much on Jewish education? Because we are Jews and not Catholics! If we were Roman Catholic, there would not be any need for us to divert to Jewish education 25 cents of every dollar donated. The funding for a significant part of the education would come from government. If we were Roman Catholic, those quarters of every dollar donated could go to funding other items mentioned in the supplement – Assisting the Vulnerable, Rescue, and other areas of Strengthening Jewish Identity. A concerted effort on the part of all members of the Jewish community pushing for equal treatment to Catholics would make Canada a better country. Continuing the current government policy will not be viable if our community stands up and takes a firm position opposing discrimination against Jews and other religious minorities.

Letter from Jakarta: Engaging Islam

By RABBI IRVING GREENBERG
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

My decision to travel to Jakarta started with newspaper accounts of a Muslim cleric-theologian, Abdurrahman Wahid, who was chosen as president of Indonesia.

President Wahid is a "Modern Orthodox" Muslim who has called for respect for Christians and Jews. He even announced that he wanted to recognize Israel, although militant groups demonstrated strongly on the streets and he backed down.

I see Jews as the litmus test of an emerging democracy. So here was Mr. Wahid, a Muslim leader, who was good for the Jews. I was fascinated.Then I heard that Mr. Wahid wanted to sponsor a Jewish-Christian-Muslim trialogue with official government participation. Mr. Wahid wanted a visible symbol of positive interaction between the groups that could serve as a role model for communal peace as well as a precedent for recognition of Israel. For me, the invitation was irresistible. I cleared my calendar.

After a 24-hour trip, I am taken straight to the presidential palace. The plane arrives late, so I miss the talk by Crown Prince Hassan of Jordan, but the president is great. He says that religion should play a positive role instead of being a source of hatred. To accomplish that, he says, Islam must accept the challenge of influencing morality and justice through participation in democracy rather than through religious monopoly and political control.

On to the trialogue. The most challenging and stimulating Muslim participant is a South African, Cornel West-type, Farid Esack. He comes across as an engaging hustler with a sense of humour. He's good-looking, articulate, pro-life, but also a strong liberation theologian.

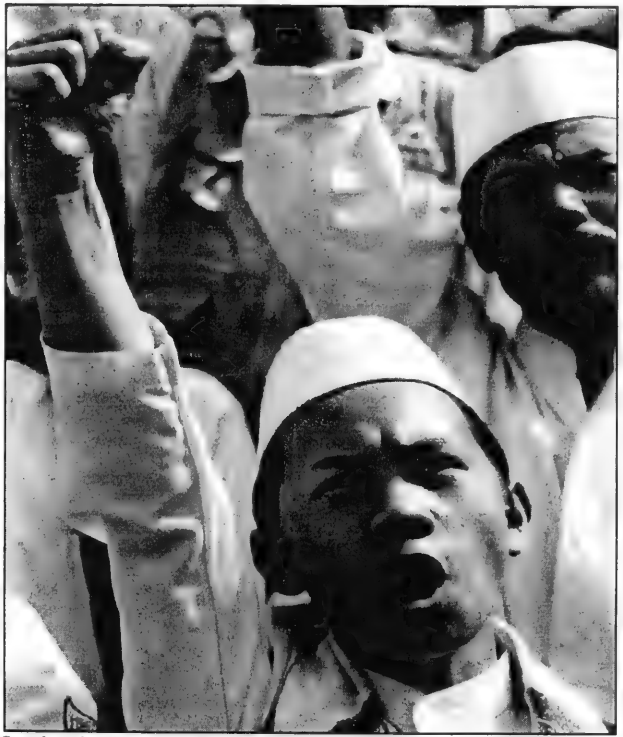
Another outstanding figure is the organizer of a United Nations world religious assembly, Bawa Jain. And then there is a critic of globalization, and of democratic culture as a force for world homogenization, Mahmoud Ayoub. He is constantly criticizing America, including its intervention in the Gulf War.

Finally, I respond by challenging his moral equivalence of democracies and dictatorships. Afterward, a number of the Muslims say privately that they are glad that someone took him on.

I ask everyone: Are there any Jews in Jakarta? There is no Israeli embassy and no synagogue. On Tuesday night, a Christian priest, Father David, tells me that there is a synagogue in Surabaya. How far away, I ask. One hour. My spirits rise; it is worth the walk on the Sabbath. It is only one hour away by plane, Father David explains.

On Thursday, my panel comes close to disaster. Mr. Esack launches into a tirade about the Jewish claim to being a chosen people. This claim serves as a front for Jewish dominance. Why do we insist upon it? He does not want to justify anti-Semitism, he says, but asks if you can blame people for being offended by a claim so haughty and dismissive of others. The explanation that "chosen-ness" means extra responsibility, is patronizing. Who appointed you to carry my burden?

It is my turn to respond. I speak of other Jews (notably Mordecai Kaplan) who share his critique. In fact, some have repudiated the chosen-people concept. I explain why I have continued to affirm the idea.



Seen here is an example of the hold of "radical Islam" in Indonesia. A young boy shouts his outrage at the Indonesian Human Rights Commission, which he and his fellow protesters claim is influenced by the Christian West. [RNS/Reuters photo]

In essence, it stems from the belief that standard views of democracy and equality imply ultimate homogenization of culture and economics so that no one is better than anyone else. The essence of "chosen-ness" is the affirmation of variety and difference. A group is called and chosen to play its particular function. What saves the claim from arrogance is that more than one people can be chosen. Indeed, this is the heart of pluralism, the affirmation that each group has a particular experience of God's love and a distinctive function to play in the world.

One of the other panelists lashes back at Mr. Esack for his implied justification for anti-Semitism and for his destructive words. Mr. Esack fires back: Never in my 25 years of dialogue have I ever been as insulted and humiliated as in this exchange. The panel ends in an unhappy and tense atmosphere. Luckily, there is no press coverage. We are hardly a living example of harmony and mutual respect between the Abrahamic religions.

Later that evening, the Jewish delegation is invited to see the president at the palace. Mr. Wahid says that he can see Christians and Muslims anytime, but he wants a chance to meet with the Jews.

As we travel toward the palace, gallows humour abounds. When he hears about this, Mr. Esack will press his case that Jewish "chosen-ness" is a front for world domination. The president is not at the palace. He is out at political meetings, campaigning, and does not show up until 11 p.m. As he enters his office, we see, in addition to being legally blind, he is also suffering the after-effects of a stroke. But even after 13 hours on the go, he is fresh and insightful.

We begin with a request that Indonesia recognize Israel. He responds with a short lecture about the pressures on Indonesia from the Muslim world. But he says that if Indonesia can diplomatically recognize China and Russia, which are godless, how can it not recognize Israel? But it is clear that he is not going to do it because of our intervention. He relates his fascination with Israel and its religious variety and openness. He has read Chaim Potok; the struggle between modern values and tradition is one that resonates deeply in his own soul. I try to give him a sympathetic reading of America's attitude toward him, and toward Indonesia as a nation at the beginning of its democratic way with a leader who is committed to religious pluralism.

In Jakarta, I was taught again that we Jews may be minuscule in number but that the world considers us to be one of the leading religions. The constant press attention to Israel and the perception that it is both powerful and isolated in the Middle East is part of this picture. Indonesians constantly asked me about George Soros and whether we could get the Jewish investors to come back to Indonesia. I stopped trying to explain that Mr. Soros is not a particularly active member of the Jewish community.

On Saturday, the dialogue concludes on a hopeful note. The Muslims from India and Indonesia are truly pluralist. The Western Muslim participants become more forthcoming. Even Mr. Esack is friendly and upbeat. The group decided to hold a press conference with one Christian, one Muslim and one Jew. One questioner is a young Indonesian journalist. He stands up and says, "I speak not as a journalist, but as a Muslim raised in a Muslim family. My parents told me that everywhere the Jews are, they are powerful people and control society. Everywhere, they are troublemakers and dangerous people. So I want to ask a simple question: If we recognize Israel, will you provide the investors who will bring us out of this economic crisis that we are in?"

I pause for a moment. I have this overwhelming urge to say: "Yes, you are absolutely correct. If you recognize Israel, I will bring Mr. Soros and all the other investors in immediately. If not, have fun trying to get out of this economic crisis on your own."

Instead, I tell the old joke about the Jew in the 1930s who reads Nazi newspapers. The reason? When he reads the Jewish newspapers they tell of the world depression, the persecution of the Jews and the closure of Palestine. When he reads the Nazi newspapers, he is delighted to learn that the Jews are all rich bankers. They control the world; they are taking over the West and invading the Middle East.

Then I speak about the worldwide attempt to revise derogatory religious teachings, and to challenge stereotypes that put down other faiths and turn religions into forces for hatred and ethnic strife. The press conference goes positively, but the look on my interlocutor's face remains skeptical. Oh well, I think to myself. It may not hurt that they think we are so powerful. Would I trade in being Jewish for an end to the attention, exaggeration, emulation? I don't think so.

A company of evil-doers

A Toronto correspondent sent me a fascinating transcript of discussions that took place three days after Kristallnacht. On Nov. 12, 1938, Hermann Goering, head of the German air force had convened the Nazi bigwigs in order to discuss what to do with the Jews, now that hundreds of their synagogues and thousands of their businesses lay in ruins.

Rabbi Gunther Plaut in Toronto

The discussion proceeded in "business-like" fashion: the assembled were concerned with the fact that the Jews had not really suffered any damage because German insurance companies would make good their losses.

Hitler's "wise men" decided that this problem was easy to solve: they would forbid the insurance companies to pay damages to Jews.

For Hitler's henchmen, "Jews" stood for vermin and though they did not as yet discuss plans for extermination, they went into great detail in discussing how to dehumanize Germany's Jewry. They would isolate and ghettoize them, and forbid them to sit next to a German, thus banning them from visiting theatres and movies. The Nazis recognized clearly that their policy would reduce most Jews to poverty, and they concluded that this would be the greatest incentive for them to leave the country.

Goering, who was also the head of Germany's financial restructuring, was focused on draining Jews of their finances. Another key Nazi leader, Reinhard Heydrich, who later became the governor general of Czechoslovakia, expressed murderous intentions towards the Jews, but at this particular session, the final extermination of the Jews was not discussed and the subject was never raised.

One thing is clear, however. The Nazis at the meeting viewed Jews as objects whose removal from Germany in one way or another had to be accomplished.

To this day, Holocaust deniers claim that Adolf Hitler never ordered the Final Solution. But in his opening statement to those assembled, Goering stated that according to the letter he had received, it was the Fuehrer's desire that the "Jewish question" be tackled comprehensively and that a total plan be devised. To be sure, Hitler did not say in his memo what the plan would be – he left that to his subordinates. They, in turn, had no hesitation in interpreting his desires in as extreme a fashion as possible. Heydrich obviously thought along these lines.

I read the stenographic report of these discussions with great absorption and deepening depression. Unfortunately, these monsters were all too serious and, to boot, they had a flair for organization. It is easy to see how their attitude ended in mass murder.

A few years later, at the infamous Wannsee Conference of January 1942, the Final Solution was finalized. Jews were to be removed from all of Europe, and this removal spelled extermination.

Jennifer Fox's personal tips on Europe

The following is the Jennifer Fox Survival Guide to Europe or How I Almost Didn't Survive Europe.

Number 1: Never visit during soccer season. I landed in Rome the same afternoon one of the Rome soccer (excuse me, football) teams won the league championship. Piles of people filled the streets, blasting horns and sporting the light and navy blue colours of their team. This was cool – a part of Roman life beyond the churches and ruins.

Five hours later, the same joyous crowd became a riotous crowd. As I tried to move against the crowd to get to the subway station, bottle-throwing fans were scattered by the explosion of tear gas bombs.

Jennifer Fox on campus in Halifax

OK, so I'm never reporting from a war zone. I don't have the constitution.

Number 2: You cannot visit France, Italy and the United Kingdom in the same trip. There's not enough room in your backpack.

France and Italy in May – warm to hot, a cold day here and there. Great Britain in May – wet, cold, wet, windy, did I mention wet? I never want to see my blue sweater again. I wore it everyday during the United Kingdom portion of the trip.

Number 3: The joys of foreign currency or "It cost what?" Paying with Italian lira gets confusing. A soft drink costs at least 7,000 lira, which only adds up to five bucks Canadian, but hearing 7,000 causes one to automatically think, "expensive." Actually, five dollars really is expensive. I knew I was right to be appalled.

Number 4: A thousand blessings to whoever decided to make museums free.

The National Gallery in London is free. So are the British Museum, the Victoria and Albert (for students) and a bunch of other places. Wonderful, beautiful paintings and it doesn't cost a pence. Sigh.

Number 5: If your travelling companion gets you lost twice in the same day, it's time to stop following her instructions. My roommate/travelling buddy is getting a compass for her birthday. Of course, it was really silly to follow her that third time…

Number 6: This way to the Sistine Chapel – big fat lie. The moment you enter the Vatican City museum there are signs reading: this way to the Sistine Chapel. You follow them, eager to see the great ceiling of Michelangelo. You follow more signs and more signs and 40 minutes later, you're still not there, though you have passed a zillion portraits of saints and other artifacts.

Unfortunately, by the time I arrived I was quite irked, it was very crowded and I only glanced at the famous ceiling. My loss.

Number 7: Just because it all looks close on the map… Paris is a big city. Give yourself plenty of time to get from point A to B. If you don't, you may start to hyperventilate by the time you finally sit down at point B.

Number 8: Something is always trying to run you down. Learn to get out of the way of cars in Paris, motorcycles in Rome, granny-style bicycles in Amsterdam, and pigeons in Venice. They're like dive-bombers.

Number 9: No matter why you decide to go – go. I didn't go to Europe to find myself, or lose myself or for any form of personal discovery. I went to see things and I did. I've got six rolls of film to prove it.

I might not ever return to those places, so it's worth all of the above – the physical collapse, the wind and rain, the inedible meals.

But if I do go again, I'm going after soccer season.

Can Israel survive as a Jewish State?

By HENRY SREBRNIK

Guest Voice

As in other modern western states, Israel has in recent years witnessed the growth of a "human rights" political culture among its intelligentsia. In that country, this development primarily involves concern for, and empathy with, Israel's growing Arab population.

Education Minister Yossi Sarid of the leftist Meretz party told Israeli Arabs in a letter circulated to teachers across the nation last year: "Your pain is our disgrace."

New history textbooks introduced into mainstream secular elementary schools in 1999 paint a more nuanced picture of the Arab-Jewish struggle for the country, in order, these pedagogues hope, to develop a new generation of more tolerant and pluralistic Israelis. The new books state, for instance, that during the 1948 War of Independence the Jewish armies engaged in ethnic cleansing and expulsions of Arabs in order to build a majority Jewish state.

"We are getting rid of certain myths," said historian Eyal Naveh, who wrote the school text, The Twentieth Century: On the Threshold of Tomorrow. He equated this development with the more enlightened view North Americans now have of the native peoples they dispossessed and the African-Americans they once enslaved.

This all seems part and parcel of a revisionist deconstruction of what is now perceived to have been an overly simplistic Zionist nationalist myth. Indeed, there has arisen a so-called "post-Zionist" school of Israeli academics and intellectuals, who want to separate Zionism and Israel altogether. They include the "new historians" Benny Morris of Ben-Gurion University, author of Righteous Victims: A History of the Zionist-Arab Conflict, 1881-1999; Avi Shlaim of St. Antony's College, Oxford, author of The Iron Wall: Israel and the Arab World; and Ze'ev Sternhell of the Hebrew University, who published The Founding Myths of Israel: Nationalism, Socialism, and the Making of the Jewish State.

In the 1920s, fierce debates raged between various schools of Zionism regarding the role of Judaism in a renewed Jewish commonwealth – was it to be a Jewish state, in the cultural and religious sense, or a state of the Jews? – but at least all agreed on basic Zionist precepts.

Today, as Yoram Hazony of the Shalem Centre in Jerusalem has noted in his new book, The Jewish State: The Struggle for Israel's Soul, the "new historians" are completely neutral toward the Zionist cause and treat Zionism as if it were no more morally compelling than the story of those who opposed it. In fact, they are intent on dismantling Israel's moral standing.

The "new historians" wish to make of Israel a "normal" country, but not in the sense that Theodor Herzl envisaged, as a nation-state for the Jewish people, in the way that Norway was for Norwegians or Italy for Italians. Rather, they advocate an ethnically and religiously neutral state. Their models include countries such as Canada and the United States, which have become, in terms of the public square, "de-Christianized." Their project therefore involves more than the formal separation of synagogue and state; it requires abolishing as much of the Jewish cultural and ideological superstructure as possible.

Obviously, for the "post-Zionists," legislation such as the Law of Return, and the myriad ways in which the Israeli state is linked to the Jewish people through the Jewish Agency and various Zionist organizations, would have to be abolished. In their view, Jews should not in any way be privileged over other Israeli citizens, financially, emotionally, or spiritually.

Ironically, this secular democratic state so dear to "post-Zionist" hearts sounds very similar to the slogans of Yasser Arafat's Fatah back in the 1960s and '70s – they, it may be recalled, favoured a "secular democratic Palestine of Muslims, Christians and Jews."

"Post-Zionist" views have been gaining ground within the country's cultural institutions, the media, the school system, and even the military. They are generating a crisis of political faith among those who shape public opinion. Will these Israeli academics succeed where PLO propagandists failed?

After a year, Barak looks politically weak

A year after taking office, Ehud Barak is struggling mightily to preserve his fractious, fragile government.

For the last few months, Barak has been locked in a fierce battle with three of his recalcitrant coalition partners. Responding to demands by Shas, he eased Education Minister Yossi Sarid – the Meretz party leader – out of the cabinet, gave Shas additional funding for its mismanaged school system, and legitimized its illegal radio stations.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

Barak, however, still faces dire resignation threats from the hawkish National Religious Party (NRP) and Israel B'Aliyah. The NRP is threatening to bolt if Barak transfers three Arab villages on the outskirts of Jerusalem – Abu Dis, Azzariye and Suwahra – to full Palestinian control. Meanwhile, Israel B'Aliyah has warned Barak that it will end its partnership with his One Israel alliance should he, as reports suggest, cede the Jordan Valley and parts of eastern Jerusalem to the Palestinians within the context of a final status agreement.

Barak, who was sworn in as prime minister on July 7 after decisively defeating the Likud's Benjamin Netanyahu in the May 17 election, courts political peril. He enjoys a comfortable 68–52 parliamentary majority, a margin which includes the 10 seats commanded by the left-liberal Meretz party, forced out of the cabinet by Shas' machinations. But Barak is politically weak and vulnerable, and should any of his partners defy him and defect, he may have to bite the bullet, dissolve the Knesset and call new elections. Failing that, Barak could form a national unity government with the Likud, but this would be an implicit acknowledgement that his peace initiatives have petered out. Alternatively, he could cobble together a minority government with the implicit backing of the Arab parties.

As a result of these developments, Barak presides over a divided government which, in terms of its membership, lists to the right. With Meretz gone from the cabinet, and with One Israel's 26 seats neutralized by the 26 mandates of Shas (17), the NRP (5) and Israel B'Aliyah (4), Barak has little room for manoeuvre, and must look for support to the Centre party (6). The predicament in which he finds himself is of his own doing, since he never seriously considered the alternative of forming a government with the participation of Shinui (six seats), Am Ehad (2) and the Arab parties (10).

Aside from the dysfunctional nature of Israel's political system, Barak's problems stem from his desire to reach an historic accommodation with the Arabs, even though he rode to power on the back of socio-economic issues. To achieve these historic objectives, he is prepared, as he has said, to take "the most critical, fateful decisions in the state's history." But such decisions, based on United Nations Resolution 242, imply sweeping territorial concessions. These are vehemently opposed by Yitzhak Levy of the NRP and Natan Sharansky of Israel B'Aliyah, and probably equally as much by Shas' leadership, including its spiritual leader, Rabbi Ovadia Yosef.

Last week, Barak declared that he is willing to renew negotiations with Syria, talks that collapsed in March when he rejected a Syrian demand for the northeast shoreline of the Sea of Galilee. But, as cabinet minister Yossi Beilin indicated, Barak may be amenable to an idea proposed by the late Hafez al-Assad's biographer, Patrick Seale. He suggested that Israel could retain sovereignty of the lake, but that its northeastern sector be controlled by the United Nations so that Israel and Syria can enjoy equal access to it.

Cognizant that the Sept. 13 deadline for a final status accord with the PA is just two months away, Barak has floated a series of trial balloons that the Palestine Authority (PA), led by Yasser Arafat, has flatly turned down. Under the latest plan, yet to be confirmed by Barak, Israel would supposedly cede 80 percent of the West Bank to the PA, retain an additional 12 percent for several years, and permanently keep 8 percent (with 80 percent of the Jewish settlers living in Israeli settlement blocs). A variation of it, offered by cabinet minister Haim Ramon, would enable Israel to annex 10 percent of the West Bank, temporarily hold 20 percent, and transfer the rest – 70 percent – to the PA.

The Palestinians are holding out for 100 percent of the West Bank. They are emboldened by Israel's full withdrawal from Egypt and Lebanon and by Israel's willingness to relinquish all but a few hundred metres of the Golan Heights. The Palestinians argue that even if they accept a withdrawal of slightly more than 90 percent from the West Bank, this would represent only 19 percent of what had been Mandatory Palestine.

With the active encouragement of the NRP and Israel B'Aliyah, the Jewish settlers of the West Bank (and Gaza Strip) are fighting a rearguard action to torpedo a massive Israeli withdrawal. Acutely aware of their zealousness and influence, Barak has tried to mollify them by word and deed.

Unlike his mentor, Yitzhak Rabin, he talks fondly about the Land of Israel and has expressed esteem for the settlers. He has pledged to strengthen Ma'aleh Adumim (the biggest settlement), and confessed that "the thought of giving up land tears my heart." And Barak has set out red lines which, he claims, he will not cross: no going back to the pre-1967 lines, no foreign armies west of the Jordan River, no division of Jerusalem, and no "right of return," in practice, for Palestinian refugees.

As a sop to the settlers, Barak legalized all but 12 of 42 West Bank encampments largely authorized by Netanyahu after the 1998 Wye accords. And according to Peace Now, Barak, in his first nine months, turned a blind eye to new building starts in the West Bank, allowing more than Netanyahu himself. In addition, Barak is permitting contractors to finish Har Choma, a housing project in eastern Jerusalem which galvanized the PA to break off peace talks with Israel in 1997.

Ehud Barak

These gestures have not appeased Israel's right-wing constituency, and certainly they have incensed the PA. Barak, in sharp contrast to Netanyahu, is serious about signing a fair and honourable deal with the Palestinians. But he has warned, "If we don't reach an accord, we are headed for a confrontation."

In this spirit, he made good on Netanyahu's promise to withdraw from a further 13 percent of the territories, leaving the PA in partial or full possession of about 40 percent of the West Bank. Barak also opened up a southern safe passage route between the West Bank and Gaza, permitted the PA to open an international airport, granted it permission to build a port in Gaza, and liberalized Palestinian residency rights in eastern Jerusalem.

Despite these concessions, Barak's relationship with Arafat, who has threatened to declare statehood unilaterally, remains tense. Claiming that Barak is deviating from the Oslo accords, the Palestinians are unhappy with Barak's failure to order another interim withdrawal from the West Bank, which, in their estimation, would leave them with 90 percent of it. They are disappointed that a northern safe passage route has yet to be established, and bitter that 1,600 of their prisoners still languish in Israeli prisons. They fear that Barak is aiming for an interim agreement that would leave significant issues – the status of Jerusalem and the fate of the refugees – dangling. They believe he does not appreciate the depth of Palestinian frustration with the slow pace of talks. And they resent recent comments by Israel's chief of staff, Gen. Shaul Mofaz, that the Israeli army will use helicopters and tanks to crush a new Palestinian rebellion.

On the home front, Barak has left the impression that he is so focused on the peace process that he has forgotten his promise to create hundreds of thousands of jobs and close glaring economic and social gaps in Israeli society, where upwards of a third of the population live below the poverty line.

Barak, too, has alienated the one million-strong Israeli Arab community due to his failure to appoint an Arab cabinet minister, this despite the fact that 95 percent of Israeli Arabs voted for him. To compensate for this faux pas, he named an Arab deputy foreign minister and appointed an Arab MK to sit on the Knesset's foreign affairs and defence committee. But these appointments have not deflected their sense of betrayal.

Similarly, secular Jews have criticized Barak for having dumped Meretz, One Israel's "natural partner," and for not having thoroughly followed through on his pledge to funnel haredi men into the armed forces.

Barak's secretive management style has offended cabinet colleagues. His cavalier treatment of Shimon Peres, the former prime minister and the current minister of regional development, has been a source of embarrassment. His refusal to appoint Avraham Burg and Yael Dayan to cabinet posts caused a stir. And his reputation for probity was tarnished by an official report which pointedly questioned One Israel's campaign funding practices.

Pummelled by carping critics on the right and the left, Barak can take solace from one major achievement: extricating the Israeli army from the quagmire in Lebanon.

URGENT APPEAL TO HELP A FELLOW JEW BLINDED FOLLOWING A VICIOUS ATTACK

Mr. Vizel, father of 17 children, was the victim of a vicious, senseless, anti-semitic attack in New York, that left him with severe head injuries and totally blind. As a result of the attack, Mr. Vizel is no longer able to provide for his family who now have the daunting responsibility of caring for their permanently disabled father.

No one should ever know the tragedy and suffering the Vizel family has endured and continues to endure. This once self-sufficient family has been reduced to relying on the generosity of their Jewish brethren for a meagre existence.

We ask everyone to help them in whatever way possible. There can hardly be a greater or more worthy Charitable donation.

Sincerely,
Toronto Rabbis: Amrom Assayag, Yeshua Fuhrer, Yitzchok Kirzner, Moshe M. Lowy, Shlome E. Miller, Duvid Pam, Baruch Taub & Dr. Allan Seidenfeld (campaign chairman) and Moshe Zolty.

Doctorow hard to follow

City of God* by E.L. Doctorow, Random House, $38.00.

This eccentric novel opens in the fall of 1959 with the random notebook jottings of a New York Jewish screenwriter called Everett – the narrator of the story – who is seeking a worthy fictional subject for his next book. He soon discovers one when a large brass cross, stolen from St. Timothy's Episcopal Church in Manhattan, ends up inexplicably on the roof of the nearby Synagogue Of Evolutionary Judaism.

Books
Bernard Baskin

The rabbis of the iconoclastic synagogue, a husband and wife team, Joshua Gruen and Sarah Blumenthal, are busy offering new religious rituals and surprising notions to their eager and liberal congregants.

The minister of the Episcopal Church, Thomas Pemberton, known as Pem, is suffering from a crisis of faith. His free-thinking ideas are distrusted by the church elders, especially since one of his sermons suggested that the Christian response to the Holocaust should have been, "Something to assure us our faith wasn't some sort of self-deluding complacency… Something as earthshaking in its way as Auschwitz and Dachau."

Pem finds kindred spirits in the young, attractive, open-minded rabbinical couple and when Joshua Gruen dies during a "mission" to Europe, he falls in love with Sarah.

The troubled priest then begins the difficult, soul-searching process of converting to Judaism.

The marriage of Pem and Sarah and the mingling of cross and synagogue seem to suggest religious accommodation or syncretism.

Is this the author's intention? It is not clear. This is only one of the difficulties in a book that contains many.

An affecting narrative strand concerns Sarah's father who as a young boy in the Kovno Ghetto served as a runner for the ghetto governing council. His main task was to secretly sneak ghetto records to the outside world for safekeeping. After the war, the archive is recovered and in a poignant episode Sarah finds the picture of her father among the young team of runners – most of whom have perished. The piece on the destruction of the ghetto by the Nazis is searing and overpowering.

Another of the novel's sequences is Everett's account, in the form of free verse, of his father's and brother's service in both world wars and his own in Vietnam.

City of God is overloaded with ideas. There is a multiplicity of subjects: God, science, bird-watching, the pernicious influence of film culture on modern society, the religious meaning of lyrics of popular songs and the fictional autobiographical thoughts of Albert Einstein and Ludwig Wittgenstein.

What is troubling about this novel is that the writing is non-linear, rambling and episodic. It is hard to follow the several parallel narrative lines, the abrupt introduction of multiple speakers, as well as the jumble of assorted bits of information and disparate ideas.

In a recent interview, the author explained the book's post-modern form in this way. "We don't think in a linear fashion like we did even 30 years ago. Our minds are like clusters of Web sites that we keep hopping between. We get meaning from discontinuity. We're the culture of the short take. I think the book is almost a template for this temporary mind of ours."

City of God demands a close and sympathetic reading. There is much interesting religious and Jewish material, and the writing is beautiful throughout. But many readers will find the task frustrating and difficult.

Mutual respect essential

By RABBI YECHIEL BEN AYON

As strong and resilient as the State of Israel is, its government is again demonstrating how fragile and brittle it can be.

In another coalition crisis, Shas, the predominantly Sephardi party, parted ways from Barak's One Israel government, leaving it without a working majority. Then, Shas was wooed back and the Meretz party quickly quit in protest!

This time, the issues (Aren't there always more than one?) are: funding for the Shas educational system and legitimization of its present "pirate" radio broadcasts.

For a national democratic government to be dissolved or even crippled over internal questions of school subsidies and use of radio waves is cause for pure amazement. For a country that won the wars, and now is busy trying to win the peace, to stop in its tracks over internal matters is lunacy of the self-destructive sort.

If truth be told – and it seldom is – the issue here is not so much one of classrooms or radio stations, but one of good old democracy. That virtue is valued and lauded by all, but when we are inconvenienced by it, it is quickly and conveniently set aside.

The minister of education, MK Yossi Sarid, abjectly declines to extend equal funding to Shas schools, although it is both morally and legally their right. Shas responds by exercising its democratic right (duty, perhaps) to leave the coalition. Yossi Sarid then calls Shas "the party of blackmailers." He proceeds to declare his own Meretz party's intention to leave the coalition should the government give in to Shas.

Evidently, for Sarid, when Shas threatens to leave the coalition, it is the undemocratic party of blackmailers; when Sarid expresses the same threat, it is an expression of high principle.

Similarly, when the attorney general, Elyakim Rubenstein, opposes legitimizing the media voice of a significant sector of society, he nobly claims that it is in the interest of maintaining the present fabric of Israel. As for freedom of speech, well at least one speaker will enjoy it.

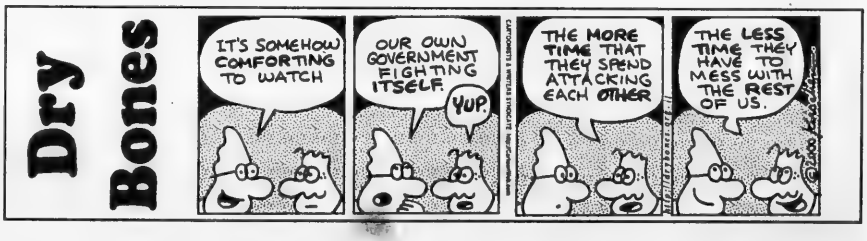
It is not possible to stop social momentum. Maayan Torani, Shas's school system throughout the country, is wildly successful. And the popularity of some pirate radio broadcasts far exceeds that of licensed stations. To try to stifle any voice in the age of Internet is downright silly.

Yossi Sarid can sit in the bleachers and pout with impertinent indignity as clearer minds search for a solution. People will continue to listen to the station that speaks to them as they go about their daily activities.

Hopefully, a compromise can be reached. Hopefully, the government will not have to call an early election. Hopefully, if there must be a new government, new issues won't make it go on a merry-go-round until it too collapses.

Most hoped for, and at the top of any wish list, one prays and one hopes and one dreams of the day when Jews (even establishment ones – especially establishment ones) will recognize and respect our differences.

And that is democracy.



Dry Bones
IT'S SOMEHOW COMFORTING TO WATCH
OUR OWN GOVERNMENT FIGHTING ITSELF.
YUP.
THE MORE TIME THAT THEY SPEND ATTACKING EACH OTHER
THE LESS TIME THEY HAVE TO MESS WITH THE REST OF US.

Jewish Life

Jewish weddings

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

You are cordially invited to attend the weddings of Caroline and Leslie Bunder. And Russell and Deborah Rothstein. And Sandra and Andrew Cohen.

Never met them? No problem. Now you can – thanks to your computer and the Jewish Highway.

But before we get to their chupahs, some background on Jewish marriage. There are several excellent overviews of the customs and traditions leading from engagement through the wedding day. Visit Ohr Somayach's Jewish Wedding Ceremony [http://www.virtual.co.il/education/education/ohr/judaism/articles/wedding.htm], the Shaarey Zedek Wedding Guide from the Conservative congregation in Southfield, Mich., [http://www.shaareyzedek.org/gwedding.htm] and the Chabad Wedding Guide [http://www.chabad.org/gopher/guide/wedding/wedding.htm]. After visiting these sites, you will understand the significance of everything from the aufruf to Kiddushin to Sheva Brachot.

For something different, I recommend Eliezer Segal's series of interesting articles [http://www.acs.ucalgary.ca/~elsegal/Shokel/Weddings_Index.html]. In one, Siegel documents the story of one of the most famous kallahs captured in art, Rembrandt's The Jewish Bride (1666) [http://www.artchive.com/artchive/R/rembrandt/jewish_bride.jpg.html]. The painting shows a plump young lady seated alongside her stylishly dressed husband. It hangs in Amsterdam's National Museum.

Siegel unravels the fascinating tale of the two and says some art historians question whether the couple who sat for the painting really were Jewish – or even married. However, others place the husband as a man leading a double life. He was a Marrano. In Brussels, where he was forbidden to return to Judaism, he was Christian Captain Miguel de Barrios, while in Amsterdam, he was David Levi de Barrios. He settled in Brussels and married his love Abigail de Pina, who was descended from a prominent Moroccan rabbinic family. You'll find more about their tumultuous lives on the Web site.

Rembrandt's The Jewish Bride is also known as The Loving Couple. But these two aren't the only Jewish lovers who have their faces on the Web. Several couples have decided to share their special moments with anyone who cares to click in. You can peek in on the ceremonies of Caroline Westbrook and Leslie Bunder [http://www.bunder.com/wedding/index.htm], Sandra and Andrew Cohen [http://gnv.fdt.net/~sandrew/wedding/wed.html] and Russell Rothstein and Deborah Fass [http://rpcp.mit.edu:80/~rir/wedding.html]. Look in on shots of the invitation and the ring, photos of the ceremony, the dancing, the meal and even a honeymoon diary!

Groom Joel Snyder joined bride Leslie Salba under a chupah. But the couple walked away single [http://detnews.com/menu/stories/27419.htm]. Actually Joel and Leslie never intended to get married. They were participating in a mock ceremony under the auspices of several Detroit rabbis and hundreds of teens who came to watch the "wedding" and gain an understanding of Jewish marriage traditions.

So all the best to Caroline and Leslie, Russell and Deborah and to whomever Joel and Leslie actually do marry. And to everyone else planning their wedding both on the Jewish Highway or by the more conventional route, mazel tov!

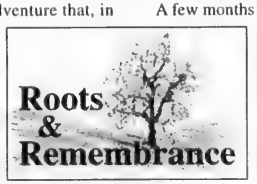
Returning to my grandfather's house

By ZE'EV GLICENSTEIN

Eileen Douglas Israel, an American television journalist, tells of a remarkable genealogical adventure that, in many respects, is a sort of archetypical Jewish tale of our times.



It's a tale not of two cities but of six; and one that spans centuries as well as continents.

The first city is New York, where Douglas lives, and where, some 15 years ago, she spotted some evocative old photographs in her grandmother's dresser. "The people were dressed in wonderful clothes – they weren't poor – and they were standing in a place that was not an impoverished little shtetl but a real city. I was intrigued."

Eileen's grandmother, then in her 90s, identified the people as the family of Eileen's grandfather, Sam Nadel, who had died decades earlier; they lived in Kovno, Lithuania. It was Kovno, Eileen learned, that her grandfather had left when coming to America in 1910.

Eileen read everything she could about Kovno. About 18 months ago, she visited the US Holocaust Museum and Memorial in Washington, D.C. to view an exhibit on her ancestral city. After museum staff put her in touch with competent researchers in Lithuania, she decided she would eventually go there, now that political conditions made the trip possible.

A few months later, after a Kovno archivist found an early address for her great-grandfather, she booked air tickets for herself, her partner Ron Steinman, and her daughter. The idea of finding her grandfather's house moved her so deeply that she also invited a camera operator along; she hoped to turn the experience into a video documentary.

"It was probably the most emotional plane ride I've ever had. I knew that when the plane landed, I would see something that no one in my family had ever imagined we would see… something beyond the dark curtain that had separated us from the past."

Eileen learned that her grandfather had been one of six siblings. Four had been killed in the Holocaust. The youngest, a sister, had been deported to Siberia one week before the Nazis invaded. In Kovno, she found that her grandfather's house had been torn down in the eighties, but that others just like it still stood nearby.

"It felt wonderful to walk the same cobblestoned street" her grandfather had walked, she said.

In the local Jewish cemetery, terribly overgrown with weeds, she found the site of her great-grandmother's grave. Movingly, she opened a vial of earth from her grandfather's burial plot in America and mixed it into the Lithuanian soil; and lit a yahrzeit candle.

Her Kovno connections helped her locate the two sons of her grandfather's sister. In May, she visited her newfound cousin, 65-year-old Moshe Romas, in St. Petersburg, Russia. And in June, she and a party of relatives flew to meet her other new-found cousin, 70-year-old Aba Romas in Tel Aviv, where he has been living since 1990.

Eileen's journey continues. This week she and Ron Steinman are due in Salt Lake City to preview a short segment of their documentary-in-progress, My Grandfather's House, at the 20th International Conference on Jewish Genealogy.

"I don't know what happened to me," she says, about this unexpected turn in her life. "All I know is something took over. No matter what else I had to do on any given day, if there was some clue to pursue, everything else went out the window.

"It was as if I was just 'drunk' with the possibilities of this. I just kept putting one foot after the other, until fate had led me back to my grandfather's home."

Sultan says goodbye with some culinary favourites

Israeli Ambassador to Canada, David Sultan and his wife Adina leave for Israel next month after a four-year assignment in Canada.

Sultan, who enjoys cooking and baking as an avocation, offers our readers three of his favourite recipes as a good-bye present to the community.

CHICKEN IN OVEN

This is a quick and easy recipe. Because of this method of cooking, low heat and lengthy cooking time, the chicken is very tender and tasty.

4-6 chicken legs
salt
black pepper
10 cloves garlic (crushed)
6 medium potatoes, medium-sized cubes
4 medium onions, medium sized cubes

Rub chicken legs with a mixture of salt, black pepper and crushed garlic.

Arrange potatoes and onions in a roasting pan. Place chicken on top and add 3 cups of water. Cover with tin foil, bake at 250F for 6 hours. After 3-4 hours add more water if needed.

BLACK LENTIL SOUP

This soup is pareve and may be served with either meat or dairy dishes. It is very simple to prepare and cooking time is approximately 30-40 minutes. All amounts are approximate.

2 cups of black lentils
8 cups water
½ tbsp. salt
1½ cups pasta (vermicelli, bowties, etc.)
8-10 cloves garlic (chopped)
2 tbsp. oil
1 tbsp. dried coriander
1 bunch fresh coriander (chopped)

Bring lentils and water to boil. Cook until tender, approximately 25 minutes. Add salt and pasta. In a fry pan fry the chopped garlic in oil, add both the dry and half the fresh coriander. Fry together until the garlic is golden brown. When the pasta is tender add the above mixture to the soup. Immediately prior to serving, decorate each bowl of soup with the remaining fresh chopped coriander. Serves 4-6

FLOURLESS/SUGARLESS DATE CAKE

This cake is pareve and may accompany any meal.

6 eggs
¾ cup margarine or oil
½ lb pitted dates
2 cups oat bran
1 cup oatmeal
3 cups (or less) crushed walnuts or pecans
2 tsp. baking powder
1 cup sweet red wine
¼ cup rum or brandy
½ tsp. vanilla
½ cup honey*

*This cake is of medium sweetness, deriving its sweetness from the pitted dates. For a sweeter cake add ½ cup honey or more, according to taste.

David Sultan

Beat eggs, add margarine or oil. Creme until smooth. Add the remainder of the ingredients. Mix well. Place in large greased loaf pan. Bake at 350 for approximately 45 minutes. Check with toothpick — if not completely baked, lower temperature slightly and bake an additional 10 minutes.

This cake may be served with a coulis made of fresh mangoes or fresh strawberries.

Chai receives top marks

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Chai Kosher Poultry has become the first kosher establishment in Canada to be recognized by the Canadian Food Inspection Agency (CFIA) for having implemented the agency's HACCP (Hazard Analysis Critical Control Point) system.

The 11-year-old company, the only kosher poultry processing plant in Ontario, processes and distributes such poultry items as chickens, turkeys, ducks and Cornish hens, across North America.

In a recent renovation, 20,000 square feet was added to the company's formerly 10,000 sq. ft. plant in the east end of Toronto.

Charles Weinberg, president, said that the process of preparing for the designation – the highest form of food inspection in Canada – took two years.

"It was a major undertaking. We had to make sure the plant was up to standards, and that all safety related programs were in place. When we finally got the approval, the staff was thrilled," he said.

From the moment the birds are picked up, until they are delivered, "everything is monitored to make sure that all health procedures are being followed. The consumer can rest assured they are getting the highest standard of poultry," he said.

Regular testing is done for the E. coli bacteria by a lab outside the plant, he said, and results are sent to him. "As well, everything at the plant has to be temperature controlled; we have to make sure that the bad air is flowing out and the good air is flowing in; and that the water and ice are regularly tested.

"In addition to the mashgiach, a federal inspector and a veterinarian are always at the plant. Everyone on the premises has to be properly attired, which means they wear head coverings, have on no jewelry, and of course, make sure their hands are clean," said Weinberg.

CFIA will perform regular audits on the plant to ensure that the safety system conforms with documented HACCP procedures, said Weinberg.

"Our ultimate goal is to ensure that everything that leaves this plant is 100 percent safe," he said.

UIA's Maerov moves to new post at Beth Tzedec

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Shelly Maerov, who played a key role in the 1998 merger of United Israel Appeal (UIA) Canada and the Council of Jewish Federations (CJF) of Canada, is looking forward to new challenges as executive director of Beth Tzedec Congregation.

The move, which became official this week, came about in a "totally serendipitous" way, the 53-year-old Calgary native said in an interview at the offices of UIA Federations Canada at the Lipa Green Building, his professional home for the past seven years.

With the UIA/CJF merger in place, Maerov felt his role as associate executive vice-president of the new organization was "more of a maintenance function" and it was time for a professional move. "I like to start things, end things or fix things," he said.

Coincidentally he was approached by a representative of the Beth Tzedec search committee earlier this year. Maerov, a member of Beth Tikvah Synagogue, where he served on the board and executive, had no prior affiliation with Beth Tzedec.

A one-time civil servant who left clinical psychology to work for the Alberta government in social policy and program development prior to moving here, Maerov sees his role at Beth Tzedec as "community development, but my community is a shul instead of a province. I'm really excited about it.

"How do you meet the needs of the largest Conservative congregation in North America? How do you invite people to come into it? How do you maintain people as their family needs change? How do you ensure quality, and how do you afford it? Those are [some of] the things they're wrestling with, and I get to be part of it."

Shelly Maerov

When Maerov lived in Edmonton, among his dozen or so Jewish and general community volunteer positions, he served as president of the Jewish federation and on the board of the national budgeting conference of UIA. The latter position led to an offer to become the CJF's first executive director in Canada.

Maerov originally moved here without his family, commuting home to Edmonton to be with his wife Louise and their sons Adam and Simon every three or four weeks for two years. He wanted to be sure that Toronto was a good choice and to see whether he could make the transition from lay person to professional, he said.

But even the inevitable organizational politics hasn't dampened his enthusiasm for his work. "I think we [Jews] have a passion that sometimes gets translated into adversarial relationships. We're farbrennt, but that's because of caring. Most people don't just walk away from the table...and that's something very special, that caring and that collective responsibility."

Does he ever have to draw on his old skills as a therapist in his Jewish community work? The question provokes a laugh, and an admission that there can be echoes.

"But I think those are just good human skills," he said. "Being able to listen, to feed back, being able to understand how and why people feel the way they do...and then to try and help people make a decision that serves the betterment of the group."

Maerov traces his Jewish involvement to his parents' and grandparents' examples. His late father Ben, a restaurateur and professional violinist, and his mother Bessie Libin, who is "still going strong" in Calgary, were always active in "shul, school [Calgary's Talmud Torah day school] and the larger community," Maerov said.

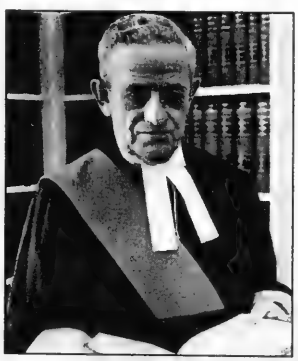
Turning professional was "one of the best things that's ever happened to me," he noted. "I wish I had gone into the Jewish professional communal service earlier. There's nothing better and more fulfilling, at least for me, than being able to contribute to the Jewish community."

'Father' of Ontario Family Court still active at 97

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A.H. (Abe) Lieff, 97, the oldest student at the University of Toronto, often leads the morning minyan at Beth Tzedec Congregation.

The soft-spoken, charismatic former judge uses a walker to get around his retirement home at Forest Hill Place on Castlefield Avenue, has a hearing aid and a magnifying glass to read the newspapers and telephone directories. He drinks a sherry before lunch and dinner. And his mind is sharp as a tack as befits the "father" of the Ontario Family Court who succeeded in convincing 90 percent of divorce-seeking couples who came before him not to carry their "dead marriage" battle to court.



A.H. (Abe) Lieff

The founder of Agudath Israel, the first Conservative synagogue in his home town of Ottawa and its president for 15 years, Lieff was the first Jewish judge to be appointed to the Ontario Supreme Court. This brought him to Toronto at age 60 in 1963. He told The CJN that the city has a superb Jewish community with brilliant leaders, wonderful educational facilities and renowned rabbis and cantors.

His long career is marked by contributions to the Jewish and non-Jewish communities, including a term on the Canadian Jewish Congress executive. He was also the founder of the west-end branch of the Ottawa Talmud Torah in 1943, president of the Ottawa Kiwanis Club in 1950 and active in the Liberal party of Ottawa and eastern Ontario.

He was saddened last year by the death of his wife, Sadie, at age 93, who had spent several years in a nursing home. Also a lawyer, she had worked at his side in an Ottawa law office that became the focus for dealing with government offices.

The couple visited Israel half a dozen times, the last time 10 years ago.

"Since her death, I particularly enjoy the fellowship of the minyans, divrei Torahs and breakfasts at Beth Tzedec," Lieff said.

For the past four years he has attended classes in Jewish studies three hours a week and is already registered for a course in Zionism this fall. "I enjoy being with the young, third-year students," he said.

His trademark is his sense of humour and humanity, particularly when he was dealing with new Canadians, using their own language when he could.

In a speech honouring his 90th birthday, Justice George Walsh noted that Lieff always told immigrants in his court that his birthplace, Anthropol, 50 kilometres east of Pinsk in White Russia (now Belarus), was close to theirs. "To this day, I am unsure of his 'moveable birthplace.' All I know is that it is somewhere between the Baltic and the Black seas," Walsh said.

Lieff, one of a family of seven siblings (six brothers and a sister) arrived in Ottawa at the age of one year, his father having gone ahead to smooth the way.

Lieff practised law for 37 years in Ottawa and became a magistrate in Carleton County before moving to Toronto. He retired in 1978 at the mandatory age of 75, and then became a family law counsellor for 13 years.

In thanking Lieff for a speech at Holy Blossom Temple after his retirement, Murray Sandler said the judge would not allow children to be bargaining chips in divorce cases.

As a lawyer, his work "reflected religious knowledge supported by Talmudic quotations," Sandler said.

He has attended Reconstructionist services in Montreal and Yizkor services at Congregation Knesseth Israel, the old Junction shul on Maria Street in Toronto.

He has two daughters, Miriam of Springfield, Mass., and Lois, a senior officer of the Jewish Education Council in Montreal.

Righteous gentile recalls horrors of Tarnopol

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Irene Gut Opdyke believes God put her in the right place, at the right time.

But it was a terrible place and time.

She was raped by advancing Russian soldiers and left to die, then forced to work in a Nazi munitions factory in occupied Poland.

Her tangled journey led her to Tarnopol, then part of Poland, now in Ukraine. It was there her life changed forever.

The diminutive 82-year-Catholic, who lives in California, seems an unlikely hero. But as she recounted last month to a crowd of 300 at the Ontario Science Centre, she had prayed for guidance in those dark days during World War II, and got it.

"God gave me free will," she said to the hushed audience. "The answer was in my soul."

The question was how to react to Jewish suffering in the ghetto of Tarnopol, which had a pre-war Jewish population of 18,000. Opdyke, then a 17-year-old nursing student, was sickened by it, having witnessed several atrocities, including seeing a Nazi soldier pull a baby from a Jewish mother's arms, fling it in the air, and shoot it like a clay pigeon.

The blonde, blue-eyed girl caught the eye of a Nazi major, who seconded her to work as a housekeeper in his lavish villa. There, in the basement laundry room, Opdyke encountered 12 Jewish men and women forced to wash clothes for German soldiers.

For the next eight months, she handed the Jewish slaves food from the major's table. She also smuggled food and blankets to Jews hiding in the nearby woods. Had she been caught, the penalty would have been summary execution for her as well as the slaves.

Opdyke also occasionally peeked at highly sensitive documents on the major's desk. One of them ordered that all Jews in Tarnopol be liquidated. Alarmed, the young girl moved the 12 Jews from the laundry to a hiding place under a gazebo in the villa's garden, just metres away from the dozens of Nazi officers who would gather for large dinner parties.

When her ruse was discovered by the Nazi major, she gave in to his bargain: He would not report the Jews in exchange for sexual favours from the girl.

"It was a small price to pay," she recalled.

Just 200 Tarnopol Jews survived the Holocaust. Among them were the 12 Opdyke rescued and one baby born during the tumult.

Asked what motivated her, Opdyke shrugged. "Courage is a whisper from above. I am thankful to God for giving me the courage and know-how to save so many lives."

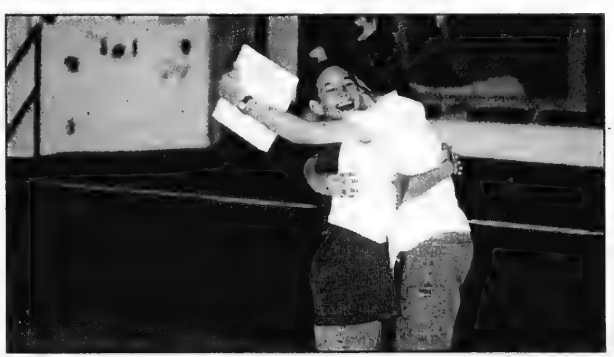
Yad Vashem in Israel has conferred Righteous Among the Nations status on Opdyke. The Jewish community in southern California accepted her late husband, who had been suffering with Alzheimer's disease, into a local Jewish nursing home.

Opdyke speaks to thousands of schoolchildren every year about the Holocaust and her heroics. She's also written her memoirs.

"The story cannot be forgotten. It has to be remembered. I ask God for another few years because there is so much to be done. I will not quit."

The message she imparts is that "there is enough hate in the world. Hate does not accomplish anything."

The evening was presented by the young leadership division of the Canadian Society for Yad Vashem and sponsored by Bank Hapoalim.



SURPRISE PRESENTATION: Associated Hebrew Schools grade 4 student Jason Klemensberg was recently awarded the annual Miriam Venis Award for Good Citizenship at the Posluns Educational Centre. As a surprise, administrators arranged for his older sister, Emily, who is a grade 6 student at the same campus, to present the award to him. She praised her brother, using humour and family anecdotes.

Niagara Falls' Torah gets new home in Barrie

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The gift of a historical Torah from B'nai Tikvah congregation in Niagara Falls shows the willingness of one small community to help another, said Robin Hadfield, president of the Simcoe County Jewish Association in Barrie.

The Torah, buried by the Nazis in Czechoslovakia along with hundreds of others, is worth from $30,000 to $50,000, and is the first one belonging to the association, Hadfield said. It has a plaque attesting to its rescue by an English synagogue.

It has already been used in the celebration of bnei/bnot mitzvah in the Barrie synagogue's rented quarters.

B'nai Tikvah congregation decided to donate the Torah after its co-president, Bob Mueller, met Hadfield in Ottawa in May, at a meeting of the Canada-Israel committee, and heard about the Barrie community's needs.

After B'nai Tikvah merged with Temple Tikvah of St. Catharines, it had one more Torah than its Aron Kodesh could hold and it was put in storage temporarily.

"This is the Torah we donated, and our hope is that now the Jewish community in the Barrie area will be taken seriously," said Mueller.

The association in Barrie is hoping to have its own building in two years, depending on how much support is received from the Jewish community in Simcoe County and outside it, Hadfield said.

"We're absolutely thrilled with the gift from B'nai Tikvah, especially since big Toronto congregations have not shown any interest."

Mueller said Niagara Falls and St Catharines together have 42 active Jewish families, compared with the potential of 300 Jewish families in Simcoe County.

"We're very proud to be one small community helping another," said Mueller.

B'nai Tikvah has services every second Friday evening to accommodate its newly merged Reform members from St. Catharines, while Conservative services are held every Saturday morning.

Beside 100 active families who are members of the Simcoe County Jewish Association, there are 100 families in the area who have shown some interest in joining, while yet another 100 families still have to be reached.

Dalhousie University planning to accommodate kosher students

BY JOEL JACOBSON
Atlantic Correspondent

On Campus

HALIFAX — Halifax's Dalhousie University may be able to offer a kosher meal plan this fall, and will open a kosher section of its Fenwick Tower apartment-style dormitory when student demand warrants, according to a Dalhousie housing official.

Heather Sutherland, head of Housing and Conference services, who met with Boris Tsinman of the Atlantic Jewish Council and JIAS following a couple of student inquiries about kosher meal plans, is in contact with kosher food providers to see what options may be available for other dormitory students this fall.

Following the initial inquiries, Sutherland told The CJN, "One of the ways we thought we could address the needs of those students was through kosher apartments."

Sutherland was able to keep open a few apartments until June 15, but she had no response as of that date. The two interested students opted for regular dorms.

The current meal plan for dormitory residents includes a vegetarian option and a salad bar.

"We're planting a seed for next year," Sutherland said of the apartment initiative. "We're letting people know that we want to co-operate and are dealing with various groups in this way as they become known to us."

She said there is no food program at Fenwick as students have their own kitchens. "They provide their own food. The rooms are furnished but students require their own dishes and cutlery."

Tsinman said the university set aside two two-bedroom units and two with three bedrooms. "If Dal has 400 Jewish students, maybe 10 would want to live together and keep kosher. We'll publicize this through our channels – Shalom magazine (Atlantic Canada's quarterly magazine), and articles in newspapers and, of course, word-of-mouth.

"Our rabbi would come in and certify the appliances," he added.

His role as JIAS chair in Atlantic Canada is to bring more Jewish people to Atlantic Canada, Tsinman said. "This is a good way to do it.

"It is a definite advantage to have a larger number of [Jewish] students coming to Atlantic Canada, and Dalhousie is providing that opportunity to us. It will certainly give Dalhousie a profile across the country as a kosher university, or at least one willing to take a forward step."

Still some loyalty in politics

Scene in Ottawa
By G.K. SIMCOE

There are many attributes that make for a good politician, but no single quality carries as much cachet as that of loyalty. In many respects, the concept of loyalty is the glue that binds. By contrast, the absence of loyalty is inevitably the harbinger of political disaster.

It may come as a surprise, but overall, loyalty is still as much practised as it is cherished. Here are a few recent examples that may serve to bolster our confidence in the oft-reviled world of politics.

George Baker is an affable Liberal hailing from Newfoundland. A year ago, he was promoted to Cabinet despite being critical of his own government when it abandoned principles or backtracked on commitments to needy Canadians. Last week, Baker threatened to resign from Cabinet unless a shrimp fishing policy favouring PEI at the expense of historical Newfoundland fishing rights was reversed. You have to admire a politician who is willing to put his money where his mouth is.

Rick Anderson is another figure in federal politics that was tested last week. The longtime politician has served as Preston Manning's closest political adviser for seven years. Following Manning's second place showing behind Stockwell Day, several influential Manning supporters jumped ship and lined up behind the former Alberta treasurer. As the week wore on, there were increasing calls in the Canadian Alliance for Manning to concede defeat.

In the meantime, Anderson was approached by some heavyweights to consider joining Ontario premier, Mike Harris, as his new chief of staff. To his credit and in an eloquent demonstration of loyalty, Anderson apparently indicated that he is not currently pursuing any other options. For someone who must be feeling vulnerable, Manning must have drawn considerable comfort from Anderson's unwillingness to explore other employment opportunities.

Finally, we cite the recent example of a former politician whose greatest strength, loyalty, was also his Achilles heel. As Joe Clark was helplessly watching the CA leadership contest draw more Tories to its ranks, along comes Brian Mulroney in an attempt to help out. There are few Tories Mulroney likes less than Joe Clark. Despite that antipathy, Mulroney ventured (for the first time since leaving politics) onto the public stage to endorse and praise Clark. It may not translate into increased support for the beleaguered Tory leader, but it was a noble gesture on the part of a man who defined the concepts of party and personal loyalty.

Winnipeg's Jewish public library closes its doors

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Winnipeg's 77-year-old Jewish Public Library has closed its doors to the public for good.

"After four years of trying to establish a reliable source of operating funds without success, the board has concluded that we can no longer continue to operate as we are," said library president Mark Steiner at a general meeting of board members.

Although the JPL had been receiving finance support from the Winnipeg Jewish Community Council for more than 30 years, financial problems began with the opening of the Asper Jewish Community Campus and the Kaufman-Silverberg Resource Centre housed in it.

The JPL was supposed to be incorporated at the Campus, but there was not enough room at the new library to house and display a majority of the JPL collection, sources said.

Thus, a good portion of the English collection was moved to the Kaufman-Silverberg site and the rest of the JPL's books were left dangling without a place to be shelved.

"We did our best," said board member and volunteer Jeanette Block. "It was just too hard to be constantly fund-raising. It didn't leave us enough time to devote to the library operation itself."

Board members and volunteers will be spending the summer boxing and dispersing the collection of 18,000 Yiddish, Hebrew and English books. Many of the Yiddish books date back to the 19th century.

The JPL board has approached the Gwen Secter Creative Living Centre, a Jewish seniors drop-in centre and the Jewish Heritage Centre at the Asper Jewish Community Campus, with the aim of relocating a large portion of its collection.

Both centres have responded enthusiastically to the JPL's overtures, Steiner said.

The Heritage Centre is particularly interested in acquiring the library's Yiddish-language Holocaust material – books published in Europe between 1932 and 1945. If space permits, the centre may accept some earlier material as well.

The Gwen Secter Centre offered to house as many as 1,000 books.

As for the rest of the collection, the Kaufman-Silverberg Centre may take some and the National Library of Canada may be interested in adding some of the books to its Jacob Lowy Collection. Another possibility is the The Jewish Book Centre in Amherst, Massachusetts.

After the books are dispersed, it is quite likely that the JPL board will establish a fund to promote Yiddish literature or continue to sponsor Yiddish programs under the JPL banner, sources said.

Circle of Care gets group shopping

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Circle of Care has introduced group shopping.

For the first time in its history, the organization, which supports seniors in the community, has a van, and one of its priorities is to make shopping easier and more pleasant by taking several seniors to shop at the same time.

The brand new van, which seats seven people including the driver, went into service June 22 when a ribbon was cut by Circle of Care president Gloria Clamen.

It will be available to clients of Circle of Care as well as to the general public, and can be used for other activities in addition to group shopping. A return trip will cost $5. For information, call the agency's intake at 416-635-2860.

Those using the van have to be fairly independent, able to walk on their own, perhaps with a cane, as no escort will be provided. The van will not be able to accommodate a wheelchair.

An attempt will be made to juggle medical or other appointments so that the van can take several seniors heading in the same direction at the same time. The passengers will be picked up and returned to their homes at a set time.

Gloria Clamen, (left) president of Circle of Care; and Sandi Ben David, chair of volunteer services and co-ordination committee.

Funds for the new van were provided by an anonymous donor from the Jewish community, and by Peter Graben Fine Foods, Great Gulf Homes and a Circle of Care bequest fund.

Winnipeg-born rabbi comes home

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — For the first time in almost 50 years, a member of Winnipeg's Jewish community who trained as a rabbi, has chosen to return to Winnipeg to begin his rabbinical career.

Rabbi David Cantor has chosen to come home and work as assistant rabbi at Shaarey Zedek Synagogue.

The last Winnipeg-born rabbi to assume a pulpit in the city was Rabbi Louis Berkal, now 86, who was also a rabbi and long-time cantor at Shaarey Zedek.

Rabbi David Cantor

The 29-year-old Rabbi Cantor, a graduate of the University of Judaism's Ziegler School of Rabbinical Studies, is a fourth generation member of Winnipeg's largest and oldest congregation. Two of his great uncles were presidents of the synagogue and his parents were married there. He also had his bar mitzvah there and was a member of the choir.

Following in the footsteps of his father, Rabbi Cantor originally opted for a legal career and graduated from law school in 1994. But he quickly realized that the legal profession was not to his liking.

At Rosh Hashanah in 1994, he was out walking with a friend and talking about how unhappy he was in law. The friend suggested he try rabbinical school.

Newly married, Rabbi Cantor and his wife, Christine, met with Rabbi Henry Balser, then the senior rabbi at Shaarey Zedek, to talk about the prospect of rabbinical school. Rabbi Balser put them in touch with someone at the University of Judaism and at an interview in Los Angeles, the dean encouraged Cantor to enroll in a pre-rabbinic program to strengthen his knowledge of Judaism.

"I decided to quit work and go back to school full time," Cantor said in an interview with the CJN.

"I was called to the Bar in May, 1995 and we left for California the next week. I wasn't necessarily planning to become a rabbi yet. I felt that I wanted to become a more complete Jew. I realized my calling while in the program."

Rabbi Cantor said he considered other potential postings, but the strongest pull was from Shaarey Zedek.

"It is hard to get a rabbi to come to western Canada," he said. "Both our families are here. There is a sense of landsmanshaften. As well, throughout my rabbinic training, I kept thinking about how I would teach this or that at the Shaarey Zedek and in my community."

Rabbi Cantor is not yet sure how he and Rabbi Allan Green, the incoming senior rabbi at Shaarey Zedek (as of September 1) will be dividing responsibilities.

"This will be a team effort," he noted. "I see myself as a teacher, preacher and resource person helping to guide people through life's passages."

He also said he wants to invite people over for Shabbos dinner as often as possible, so that he and his wife can model and share the Jewish vision of the good life.

"The office staff here isn't quite sure what to call me yet because they have known me all my life," he said. "I don't expect to be treated any differently than before. I respect other people's comfort levels in this matter."

צניעות כדרך חיים

שהיתי השבוע בפאלם ביץ פלורידה בכנס רפואי. במקום ההיא בית ממוצע נמכר במיליונים, ופחית קוקה קולה ב 4 דולאר. בקיצור, צניעות איננה התכונה הבולטת בחבל הארץ הזה. לכן די היספתי כשהציעו לי לבקר בביתו של המיליארדר שפיתח את חבל הארץ הזה. הבית הפך למוזיאון שמציג את עושרו ואת אוסף נעליה של אישתו השלישית, וכדי לעשות את החוויה עוד יותר קשה, המדריכה במוזיאון מתארת בשקיקה את חיי העושר כפי שנראו בסוף המאה התשע עשרה. המורה לאמנות שלי בבית הספר התיכון התלונן לפני שנים רבות על כך שמלמדים היסטוריה דרך חייהם של העשירים, במקום להראות את תולדות בית חשימוש.

וואללה, אמרתי לעצמי, זה משהו שבשבט שלי לא היה יכול לקרות, כי אצלנו אנשים בדרך כלל רוצים שהשם שלהם יופיע גם אחרי תרומה מזערית. אבל שיישאר בינינו.

כולם נוסעים

עוד מעט וכולם נעלמים, מי לישראל ומי לכל ארבע פינות העולם. וכשבא לך לדבר עם חבר, לפעמים צריך לחכות שבועיים ואפילו חודש. האמת היא שדווקא בקיץ טורונטו היא עיר מדליקה, מלאת פסטיבלים ושמחות מקיר לקיר. ואם בא לכם לכיף ממש, בלי לעזוב את גבולות קנדה, תיסעו לניו פאונדלנד ותשנו את דעתכם על הניופים, ותרצו לנסוע לשם שוב.

במזרח התיכון

במזרח התיכון נכנע ברק לש"ס, בדיוק כמו קודמו, ובדיוק כמו זה שיבוא אחריו. זה דווקא נותן הרגשת ביטחון שיש דבר אחד שלא משתנה בארץ הקודש, ושמה שלא מצביעים, מקבלים את ש"ס. אבל שיישאר בינינו.

AVA to focus on environmental education

By MARLANE SMITH
Pacific Correspondent

VANCOUVER — Noam Dolgin believes he has a personal responsibility to protect the environment. As a board member of Vancouver's Adam va-Adamah Jewish Environmental Society (AVA), he's probably on the right career track.

"I think it's the responsibility of every human, but Jewish law and tradition creates a moral value which especially demands us to be protective of the natural world," he said in an interview.

AVA, a grassroots environmental organization, aims to educate B.C. Jews about ecological responsibility, and work toward re-establishing environmental integrity.

A recent $6000 grant from the provincial environment ministry will assist Dolgin and AVA in disseminating environmental education in Vancouver Jewish schools. The money will also be used to hire a part-time employee for a four-month contract–AVA's first paid position since the group formed two years ago.

"It's not a lot of money," Dolgin commented, "but it's a stepping stone toward an ongoing position."

Funded under the ministry's youth-employment branch, the grant must be directed toward youth-focused organizations. AVA's part-time employee must be between the ages of 16 and 24.

Dolgin said programming under the grant will be directed toward Vancouver's Talmud Torah School, but may also expand to Richmond Jewish Day School, Vancouver Jewish Community High School and UBC's Jewish organization, Hillel House.

Starting in September, the contract employee will develop programs and events such as field trips and environmental assessments for Jewish students.

"There will be trips that focus on environmental education and we'd like to make some aspects of it a little more practical by having kids evaluate the environmental practices of their school," Dolgin said.

"Programming may also include teaching about Jewish attitudes towards the natural world and the interconnectedness between us and the land," he added.

Dolgin's educational background includes a University of British Columbia degree in environmental sciences, and one-year of study at Israel's Arava Institute for Environmental Studies.

He recently returned to Canada after working at New York's Teva Learning Centre, the only Jewish environmental education centre in North America.

AVA now boasts Lower Mainland and Victoria-area Jews of all ages and backgrounds as members.

"We have more and more people asking about the organization all the time. If I said the name Adam va-Adamah a year ago, no one would have even heard of it. We have a lot of community-based support," Dolgin said. "We still need to grow more, though."

With an eight-person board and "a large support system of volunteers" and affiliations with a dozen Jewish organizations, AVA officially registered as a non-profit society in October 1999. "We've applied for charitable status which we should be getting any day now," Dolgin said.

As it continues developing environmental educational events within the framework of the Jewish cycle of festivals, AVA's next major focus is fund-raising.

"Our hope is to extend the part-time position beyond four months. We're avidly looking for funding to maintain a large presence in Vancouver and elsewhere in B.C. The hope is that money begets money," Dolgin said.

For further information about Adam va-Adamah, call its chairperson, Alan Morinis at 604-872-1614.

About Nutrition

By LISA WEINBERG

Q. I am due to have my third baby in a few weeks. I have chosen the infant formula that I am planning to use for the baby, because it was well tolerated by my first two children. However, I just found out that a different brand of formula is used and provided in the hospital where I am delivering. Is it okay to give my newborn the hospital's brand for the first few days and then switch when I get home?

A. Yes, it is absolutely OK. I did the same thing. The only thing to make sure of is that they are both cow's milk-based or soy-based. If there is an allergy issue, you must request a specialized formula in the hospital too.

Q. I took folic acid before becoming pregnant. I am now six weeks pregnant and have continued taking it. When do I switch from folic acid to a full maternity vitamin?

A. There is no real rule here. I would ask your doctor at your pre-natal checkup what he or she recommends. However, pre-natal vitamins contain the recommended one milligram of folic acid per day, so you will be getting the full dose of folic acid either way.

Many doctors say you don't need the full dose of other vitamins and iron until about 10 or 12 weeks. I find the most common determining factor for my patients and for myself is how nauseous you feel. The iron load in maternity vitamins can add to the nausea, so if you are experiencing these symptoms, you may want to hold off until about 12 weeks or take them every other day only. It helps to take maternity vitamins at night and on a full stomach.

In the meantime, continue with the folic acid. It is critical in the first weeks of a fetus's life, usually the weeks before you even know that you are pregnant.

Patient care, research gets $2M boost

TORONTO — The Ellen and Martin Prosserman Family Foundation has made a $2-million donation to Mount Sinai Hospital to advance patient care and research in two medical fields – cardiac care and the link between genetics and disease.

The gift will support the establishment of two new centres at the hospital. The Anna Prosserman Heart Clinic, named in memory of Martin's late mother, Anna, will provide treatment for people who have experienced heart failure. The Prosserman Centre for Health Research will become part of the hospital's Samuel Lunenfeld Research Institute and will combine biology with modern technology to investigate the secrets of genetics and its relationship to the spreading of disease.

Construction on the new centres is expected to begin later this year and take approximately two years to complete.

"We are particularly excited about these projects because we know that they will help a lot of people in the future," said Martin Prosserman.

Prosserman founded the Montreal-based Golden Brand Clothing in 1961, which manufactured and imported men's suits. He later established the retail chain Moores, The Suit People which he operated with the assistance of his sons, Gary, Ron and Brian. The Prossermans sold Moores, The Suit People in 1996 after the chain had grown to more than 90 stores countrywide and had over 1,000 employees. The family relocated to Toronto.

Ron Prosserman is a member of the Mount Sinai Hospital Foundation board of directors, and introduced his parents to the hospital.

The Anna Prosserman Heart Clinic will receive $500,000 of the gift. The new clinic will include 3,000 square feet of space and will enhance the services currently offered by the hospital's clinical and academic programs in cardiology.

"The establishment of the new clinic will mean that instead of operating a congestive heart failure clinic twice a week as part of our general cardiology clinic, we will have a separate area for treating heart failure patients on a daily basis," explains cardiologist Dr. John Parker.

"It will be an area where patients will be able to receive a full gamut of subspecialty care, ranging from educational, nutritional and/or social work assistance to specialized medical and nursing care in the management of this disease. It is anticipated that the congestive heart failure clinic patient volume will at least double, allowing for up to 3,000 patient visits per year."

The Prosserman Centre for Health Research, which receives $1.5 million, will provide the infrastructure for an innovative multidisciplinary program in genetic epidemiology at Mount Sinai. Approximately 12,000 square feet will be constructed and divided into research offices, laboratories, computer facilities, and areas for data collection and analysis.

"Our goal is to develop the leading centre in Canada for genetic epidemiological research," says Dr. John McLaughlin, head of the Alvin B. Rosenberg Division of Epidemiology and Biostatistics at the Samuel Lunenfeld Research Institute.

"The research at the Prosserman Centre for Health Research aims to identify genetic and environment factors that impact on human health and disease, and to evaluate strategies that provide health benefits to individuals and the community, by reducing the impact of major diseases," McLaughlin says.

"For example, we know that certain genes are associated with an increased risk of developing breast and ovarian cancer, but we need to find out what and how environmental factors interact with genes to determine disease. This could lead to new strategies to prevent and treat disease."

In 1995, the Prosserman Family Foundation established the Ellen and Martin Prosserman Surgical Centre at the Jewish General Hospital in Montreal.

Temple Mount should remain under PA: Bakshi-Doron

By BARUCH KRA
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — For the first time, a chief rabbi of Israel has declared that the Temple Mount should remain under Palestinian administration, even after a final agreement is reached between Israel and the Palestinians.

A written declaration to that effect, was sent by Sephardi Chief Rabbi Eliahu Bakshi-Doron with an Israeli delegation to an interfaith meeting with Muslim and Christian Palestinians, that was held in Milan.

The Israeli delegation included rabbis, among them the personal emissary of Rabbi Bakshi-Doron, Rabbi David Brodman, the chief rabbi of Savyon, near Tel Aviv.

Another proposal made by the Israeli delegation called for the establishment of an interfaith council that would be responsible for all the holy places in Jerusalem, particularly the Temple Mount.

The meeting was organized by two academics – Yair Hirschfeld and Ron Pundak – who were instrumental in bringing about the talks that led to the Oslo Accords in 1993, together with East Jerusalem's Arab Studies Society, headed by Faisal Husseini.

Pundak and Hirschfeld maintain that the Temple Mount constitutes the major stumbling block for achieving an Israeli-Palestinian peace treaty.

Among those who attended the meeting were Jerusalem native Hayan al-Idrisi, an imam and qadi, or judge, on the Muslim sharia court, considered to be a Muslim extremist; Majdi Siriani, a Roman Catholic priest prominent in Jerusalem's Christian community and members of the Palestinian legislative assembly. The Vatican sent an observer to the meeting.

The last time the Israeli Chief Rabbinate addressed the status of the Temple Mount was after the 1967 war. At that time the chief rabbis agreed that the site would be administered by the Palestinians, as part of the status quo arrangements that preceded the signing of any agreements.

Since then, chief rabbis have made only indirect references to the issue, and all from the hawkish side – such as Rabbis Avraham Shapira, Mordechai Eliahu and Shlomo Goren – based on their desire to apply Israeli sovereignty to the Temple Mount.

"For the good of the peace," Bakshi-Doron wrote, "we find that a declaration should be made of our understandings regarding the holy places in Jerusalem. "Instead of doing injury to the holy places, which to others is known as the area of Al Aqsa Mosque…we must respect and accept the status quo of the holy places, especially of the Temple Mount."

Waqf can continue controversial digging

By NADAV SHRAGAI
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Prime Minister Ehud Barak last week ordered that the waqf, or Islamic religious trust, be permitted to continue its tiling work on about 200 metres of the eastern wall of the Temple Mount, up to the Golden Gate (also known as the Gate of Mercy).

The order came at the end of a meeting of ministers, senior officials and security officials held at the Prime Minister's Office to discuss the ongoing work being carried out by the waqf in the Temple Mount compound.

Barak also instructed the authorities to allow archeologists from the Antiquities Authority onto the site and to prevent the tiling work from developing into more extensive construction activity. This directive came in the wake of warnings by security officials that the waqf intends to turn large areas on the Temple Mount into another mosque and that the tiling activity is only the first step in that project.

The prime minister rejected a recommendation from Attorney General Elyakim Rubinstein and the Antiquities Authority to halt the tiling work or limit it so that it stops short of the Golden Gate. He also vetoed a recommendation to prevent the entry of heavy machinery, trucks and tractors to the Temple Mount, but directed the relevant officials to maintain "reasonable supervision" of the traffic entering and leaving the compound through the Lions' Gate (St. Stephens' Gate).

Jerusalem Mayor Ehud Olmert, who attended the meeting, called for police to be stationed at the Lions' Gate to block the entry of trucks, bulldozers and building materials to the Temple Mount. After the meeting, he said, "no one is suggesting that we break into the Temple Mount compound with bayonets," but "cautious, intelligent" action should be taken "in order for us to regain control of the Temple Mount."

Barak's policy and security adviser Danny Yatom said after the meeting that its conclusions, which he refused to divulge, would ensure that the status quo on the Temple Mount is preserved, and prevent it from being violated by the waqf.

"We will do everything to maintain the status quo, but not to change it – not in our favour and not in anyone else's favour," Yatom stated.

The Shin Bet security service warned that extreme right-wing groups were agitated by the waqf's construction work on the Temple Mount and might try to break into the site or take other action to protest the damage they claim is being done to sacred Jewish antiquities.

Vatican proposes open channel for talks

By DALIA SHEHORI
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Officials at the Vatican are proposing that a permanent mechanism for consultations between the Vatican and Israel be set in place to examine in advance decisions that might give rise to emotional responses on either side.

The proposal was made last week at a meeting of the Forum for Inter-Religious Dialogue headed by government secretary Yitzhak Herzog.

The forum was set up following Pope John Paul II's visit to Israel, and convened for the first time at the Jerusalem Van Leer Institute. Among the participants was the Papal Nuncio to Israel, Archbishop Pietro Sambi.

The idea for the "hotline"-like mechanism was first proposed in the wake of criticism expressed by Rabbi David Rosen, the director of the Anti-Defamation League in Israel, about the Pope's plan to beatify Pope Pius IX – and to do so on the same day that he canonizes Pope John XXIII, who established the first ecumenical conference with the Jews, winning the heart of worldwide Jewry.

The 19th-century Pope Pius IX is known by Jews for his role in the kidnapping of Edgardo Mortara, one of eight children of a Jewish family. When Mortara was ill, he was secretly baptized by the Catholic servant who worked in the Mortara home. On June 23, 1858, when Mortara was six years old, the Vatican Guard came to his home and forcibly separated him from his parents to give him a Christian education. Canonical law at the time required the Church to take responsibility for all baptized children.

All attempts to have the child returned to his family, including the intervention of Sir Moses Montefiore, failed. Pope Pius IX said that the pleadings by the Jews were an anti-Catholic conspiracy. He took Mortara under his wing and made him his protege. Mortara became a Catholic priest and eventually changed his name to Pius Mortara.

Rabbi Rosen said last week that it was not "up to the Jews" to tell the Catholic Church who to canonize, but if the Church is sincere in its desire to embark on a new era of dialogue and mutual respect in which it will be sensitive to the Jews, "there must be a kind of dialogue in which they are aware of our sensitivities and consult with us."

He said the intention to canonize Pope Pius IX on the same day as Pope John XXIII (Sept. 3) constitutes an injury, "first of all to the status of Pope John XXIII and secondly to us, as they are bringing Pope Pius IX, who forced baptism, in through the back door."

At last week's conference, Church sources stressed the need to bring Pope John Paul II's message of reconciliation between Christianity and Judaism to the rest of the ranks of the Church. They said that meetings should be held in both Israel and Rome of all the bishops involved in relations with Israel, to discuss the question of how to have the Pope's position become the attitude of the church as a whole.

Allegations of abuse rock OU and synagogues

By JULIE WIENER
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

NEW YORK — The largest synagogue-sponsored chapter of National Conference of Synagogue Youth (NCSY) seceded last week from the youth arm of the Orthodox Union (OU) in part as a result of recent reports on allegations that a high-ranking Orthodox youth professional sexually molested and harassed scores of teenagers.

The decision by Beth Aaron Congregation in New Jersey was a powerful message to the national leadership about how the situation was handled over the years. It also indicated the crisis is not over.

In a June 23 article, the New York Jewish Week quoted sources saying that, for almost three decades, the Orthodox Union had ignored complaints of Rabbi Baruch Lanner's misconduct as a professional with the OU's National Conference of Synagogue Youth.

Rabbi Glenn Black, regional director of NCSY in Toronto, said that he was "shocked by the allegations. I found out the same time as the rest of the world, and was very saddened.

"The bottom line is that we have to stay focused and try to develop protocol should any child have concerns. They are welcome to contact us, or Jewish Family and Child Services."

Youth groups react to news reports, say their policies prevent problems

The day after the newspaper article appeared, the OU announced that Rabbi Lanner had resigned, but despite his resignation, congregants at Beth Aaron Congregation voted to immediately withhold all monies to be paid to the OU and to national and regional NCSY.

One congregant said members were deeply concerned over what they observed to be a lack of proper adult supervision in NCSY programs in other regions and chapters.

Rabbi Lanner was known as a charismatic, talented educator who drew many teens closer to Judaism.

A widespread complaint is that Rabbi Lanner has moulded and trained a number of rabbis and youth leaders who emulate his charismatic style and sometimes eccentric behaviour, encouraging advisers to do whatever is necessary to make youngsters more observant.

Rabbi Chaim Fraser, chair of the NCSY youth committee, said that Rabbi Lanner had been unwelcome at its NCSY programs for years, and that he had been unwelcome as well in up to half of the 12 regions in the country because of his behaviour and style.

He did, however, lead a group of students on the Birthright Israel trip last winter, and participated regularly in NCSY Shabbat retreats and Shabbatons across the United States.

For the first time, more than a dozen former NCSYers and others have come forward to publicly tell their stories.

Judy Klitsner, 42, of Jerusalem, said that when she was 16, and active in NCSY in Pennsylvania, Rabbi Lanner tried to caress and kiss her. "When I rebuffed him, he tried to strangle me... I was afraid to tell anyone because he had a volatile temper and I was afraid of reprisal."

When she later told Rabbi Lanner that she would inform his supervisor, he laughed and said his supervisor already knew of his behaviour. "It is immoral, that this coverup has gone on for decades," she said.

Klitsner, and several other critics of the rabbi said they were adamant about going on the record publicly, insisting they did not believe the OU would take action unless forced to do so by communal pressure.

They also spoke publicly, they said, because relieving Rabbi Lanner of his duties quietly allowed his record to be unblemished and he could, therefore, still work with youngsters.

An NCSY statement released last week, said that Mandell Ganchrow, president of OU was forming a commission of seven to 10 men and women from inside and outside OU who will review procedures monitoring personnel, and "immediately make changes as the study may indicate."

Lay and professional leaders of OU are split, with some insisting that only the resignation of top personnel will address what many say is a crisis of credibility.

Others believe that the issue, no matter how painful it is now, will soon abate, and they are calling for limited actions.

J.J. Goldberg named new Forward editor

By JULIE WIENER
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

NEW YORK — The new editor of the Forward newspaper said the paper's ideology is likely to change under his stewardship.

"I've been reading in the papers that Seth Lipsky is a conservative," said J.J. Goldberg, referring to the former editor of American Jewry's most famous newspaper.

"Most of my friends say I'm pretty liberal. I'll be writing the editorials, so you're probably going to see a difference," Goldberg said at last Friday's news conference announcing his appointment.

Goldberg, the author of Jewish Power: Inside the American Jewish Establishment and a former managing editor at both the Forward and the New York Jewish Week, said he wants to make the weekly newspaper one that chronicles "the lives of ordinary people" and speaks "in a voice that gives everyone the benefit of the doubt."

Goldberg, an alumnus of the Labour Zionist Habonim-Dror youth movement and a former member of a kibbutz, said he will bring a different political outlook.

As he outlined his vision for the Forward, Goldberg – who will begin on July 1 – appeared careful to neither criticize Lipsky nor offend the Forward Association members who sat beside him. He praised both Lipsky and the Yiddish Forward's founding editor, Abraham Cahan, saying, "I'm stepping into some large shoes."

Founded by Cahan in 1897, the Yiddish Forward at one time had a daily circulation of 250,000.

Asked whether the tone of the Forward would be sensationalist under his editorship, Goldberg, 50, said, "I want to tell the truth, but I don't want to humiliate anyone."

'I want to tell the truth, I don't want to humiliate anyone'

He added that the press should "call the powerful to account," let readers know how communal dollars are being spent and "tell it straight," but said he does not want to "call names."

Goldberg, whose weekly columns have appeared in Jewish newspapers across the United States, said he hopes to boost popular awareness of the Forward and turn it into a publication that is "about the actions of the powerful and the lives of the ordinary.

"It's going to be funnier," he said. "We're going to talk about things Jews care about, whether or not the rabbis say they should."

Under his watch, the Forward will be "the place where Jews fight it out with each other" and where everyone gets "a fair hearing," said Goldberg.

He also plans to strengthen ties between his paper and the Yiddish and Russian Forwards.

For the most part, all three papers print different stories.

Goldberg said he does not share Lipsky's dream of turning the paper into a daily.

"I don't have a big hangup about dailies," said Goldberg. "I've been doing weekly journalism most of my career and love it. It gives you time to look at things and develop a perspective on them."

Goldberg's responsibilities will lie solely on the editorial side of the paper.

"I don't want any part of the business end," he said.

The paper's circulation is below 30,000 and it has suffered annual losses of approximately $2 million. However, officials with the Forward Association said that advertising revenues have gradually been increasing. They said they will name a separate business manager shortly.

Lipsky's departure spurred philanthropist Michael Steinhardt, a joint owner of the Forward, to sell his share in the paper to the Forward Association.

Sam Norich, general manager of the association, said the sale is still expected, but that Steinhardt will likely continue to serve as vice-chair of the paper.

Steinhardt, who recently invested in Jewish weeklies in Atlanta and Detroit, did not attend the news conference.

Goldberg's nationally syndicated columns will end once he begins his post at the Forward.

Lebanese ponder: What will Bashar do?

By SHELDON KIRSHNER

Mideast Analysis

Cutting its losses, Israel withdrew from its self-declared security zone in southern Lebanon on May 24, ending a long and costly engagement and leaving another regional power, Syria, to occupy that country.

As a result of Israel's retreat, Syria's military presence in Lebanon is being increasingly questioned. Critical voices were heard even prior to Israel's withdrawal.

In March, Gibran Tueini, the managing director of An-Nahar, one of Lebanon's leading newspapers, urged Syria to pull out. The demand took the form of an open letter to Bashar al-Assad, who has since succeeded his late father, Hafez, as president. In short, Tueini called on Syria to "recognize the sovereignty of Lebanese territory."

In April, thousands of students, mainly Christians, marched through the streets of Beirut chanting "Lebanon first! The Syrian army out!" and distributed leaflets demanding a Syrian evacuation based on United Nations Resolution 520. The demonstrators were routed by the police on orders of the compliant Lebanese government.

Syria, which has been in Lebanon since 1976, was ruffled by these developments. The last serious challenge to its authority was mounted a decade ago by Michel Aoun, a Lebanese Maronite army general who was driven out of Lebanon by Syrian forces in 1991 and who now lives in exile in France.

By the terms of the 1989 Taif accord, which ended the agony of Lebanon's second civil war, Syria agreed to pull its 35,000 troops out of Lebanon once constitutional reforms were enacted. They are now in place, yet Syria is still in Lebanon.

So the question on the lips of many Lebanese is what Syria's newly-minted president, Bashar al-Assad, intends to do about Lebanon.

If he remains true to his father's policy, he will hesitate long and hard before he calls back his soldiers to Syria. For historical reasons, Syria does not regard Lebanon as just another nation, but as an integral building bloc of Greater Syria, a construct which has guided Syria's conduct there.

Greater Syria, composed of present-day Syria, Lebanon, Jordan and Israel, dissolved with the collapse of the Ottoman Empire in 1918. As the colonial scramble in the Middle East intensified, France grabbed Syria and broke off pieces from it to create modern Lebanon. The Syrian elite never forgot that indignity, and seized on Arab nationalism to fight Western colonialism.

Syria, after independence in 1946, was too weak to pursue its interests in Lebanon. Coups and counter-coups turned Syria into an extremely insular nation. But in the wake of Hafez al-Assad's accession to power in 1970, Syria entered the most politically stable phase in its turbulent history.

Regarding Lebanon as its patrimony, Syria began to meddle in Lebanon's internal affairs. Syria intervened in its 1972 election. In 1976, a year after the civil war erupted, Syria dispatched an expeditionary force to Lebanon with the blessing of the Arab League. Under an agreement brokered by the United States, Syria kept its forces well away from Lebanon's frontier with Israel. Syria, however, encouraged the PLO to mount attacks against Israeli border settlements.

Today, as in the past, Syria considers Lebanon an important strategic and economic asset it can manipulate at will.

Syrian tanks guard possible invasion routes into Syria via Lebanon. From approximately 1985 until Israel's precipitous withdrawal from Lebanon, Syria used Hezbollah as a surrogate by which to pressure Israel into relinquishing the Golan Heights.

Lebanon has also been exceedingly useful to Syria from three other perspectives. It is a tariff-free dumping ground for Syria's surplus agricultural produce. It provides jobs for about one million Syrian workers. It is the centre of the drug trade from which Syrians profit.

Is Syria prepared to give up these benefits? We will see.

Don't just sit there vegging out, do something

By EILEEN GOLTZ
Special to The CJN

You have been outside all day. You are really, really tired, starving, and it feels as though there are still a couple of years to go before dinner. And your mother doesn't want you to just veg out in front of the TV.

What can you do?

Here are some suggestions. They are also great for those occasionally rainy, muggy and all-around icky days that we sometimes have to deal with.

Eat healthy snacks: Don't have empty calories like chips, candy or ice cream. They will make you feel better at first, but then you will feel even worse than you did before. Have fruit, juices, cereal and milk, even popsicles sometimes. Try freezing grapes or making popsicles from orange juice with a few strawberries sliced in.

Make a tent: Pull together a few chairs or tables. Drape blankets, towels or sheets over the top and fill up the space with books, toys and a few snacks. Flashlights are a must.

Make sock puppets: Use socks, glue and leftover ribbon, buttons and stuff in the junk drawer. If you don't have enough socks, use lunch bags.

Have a paper airplane contest: Give everyone eight to 10 sheets of paper, and fold airplanes. Put your name on them, and try to sail them into a garbage can or hit a target pillow.

Sort pictures: Look through pictures that have to be put into albums. Sort them by date or by the event. Or look through old albums. Ask your parents to tell you about the things and people you see.

Make a book: Set out paper, pens and crayons. Choose funny topics like The dinosaurs that lived (or live) on my block, or What my mom (or dad) does all day, or Goofy animals at the crazy zoo. Write a story, illustrate it, and make a cover. You can staple the pages together or punch holes and tie the book together with ribbons or string.

Dress up: Ask your mom for old hats, skirts, dresses, coats or shirts, or any old clothes, makeup or costumes, and have a tea party or make up a play.

Create a play: Even if there aren't any old clothes, put on a play. You can practise it before dinner, and then invite your parents or friends to watch it later.

Play sardines: One person hides. Everyone counts to 50 and then tries to find the hider. The first person to find the hider squeezes in with him or her. The next one who finds the two hides with them, and so on, until only one person is left. That player is the first one to hide in the next game.

Bubble bath: Who cares if it's the middle of the day? Stay in until you are all wrinkled. Be careful that no one falls asleep.

Self-portrait: Have someone trace your entire body on butcher paper. Fill it in with crayons or marker, or, if your mom or dad allows it, paint. Be sure to clean up afterwards.

The following ideas may be messy! You might need some help from a grownup or an older sister or brother to make these recipes safely.

Make finger paint: In a big saucepan, combine 1 cup flour and 1 cup cold water. Stir until smooth. Add three more cups of water and cook over medium heat, stirring constantly until the mixture thickens and bubbles. Turn down the heat slightly and cook an extra minute or two.

Remove from heat and separate the mixture into four bowls. Use several drops of food coloring to tint each bowl (make sure to use dye that doesn't stain your hands). Cover the bowls with plastic wrap and let cool to room temperature. When the paint cools, it's ready to use.

Peanut butter playdough: (Your mom won't worry if you eat this!): In a large bowl, combine 2 cups of creamy peanut butter, 2 cups of powdered milk and 3 tbsp. honey. Mix well. If it's too sticky, add a little more powdered milk. You can use raisins and carrots to help build whatever you like.

Paint with pudding: Mix up a batch of instant pudding, using about ¼ cup less milk than the recipe calls for.

Cover the table with newspaper and put the paper on which you are going to paint on top of it. Use your fingers as paint brushes by dipping them in the pudding and transferring the pudding to the paper and drawing.

PEACEMAKERS CELEBRATE: THE PEACEMAKER programme at USDS, Bathurst campus in Toronto recently held a carnival to celebrate the success of the programme which enables students to solve their own schoolyard problems during the year.

Yiddishe Zaidy stories on video

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

A 25-minute cartoon in English and Yiddish called Zaidy Stories is just as appealing to parents as it is to children, according to animator Rabbi Uri Gelman.

The first video of its kind, Zaidy Stories has four tales in cartoon form, told first in English and then in Yiddish translation.

The video supports Rabbi Gelman's own philosophy that God the Creator protects even insects, and that there is reason to be optimistic about the future.

"Our idea is to provide entertainment for children instead of the sensational media and violent cartoons they see on TV," he said.

A native of Russia, Rabbi Gelman lived in New York before coming to Toronto. He has served the Russian-Jewish community here for six years and conducts Sabbath services regularly in a Bathurst Street apartment building.

Many of the drawings for Zaidy Stories were done by the rabbi in his Toronto apartment, and the rest in the United States, where he was associated with JEV publications. He has already started on another cartoon project with the same publisher.

His own favorite is The Longing, in which a Chassid travels miles to see his rabbi and arrives in time to join a group of Jews being transported to Jerusalem by the Mashiach.

The theme of The Young Soldier is the power of the Baal Shem Tov. A Russian general in the field, worried about his wife who is due to give birth to their baby, learns that the Baal Shem Tov can foresee the future. He asks that the Baal Shem Tov come to him, but is directed instead to the home of the revered spiritual leader. Here he looks into a mirror and sees his wife safe and sound playing with her new baby.

The biggest market for Zaidy Stories is among families rather than in schools, particularly because of the renewed interest in Yiddish as a result of the celebration of 1,000 years of that language, Rabbi Gelman said.

Selling for abut $29, the video is available at Israel's, the Negev, Aleph Bet Judaica and Moshiach Centre.

Voyages intertwines the lives of three elderly Jewish women

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Esther Gorintin as Vera in Voyages

In Emmanuel Finkiel's sombre film, Voyages, which opens on July 13 at the Cumberland 4 theatre, the lives of three elderly Jewish women haunted by the Holocaust appear mysteriously intertwined.

Rivka, an Israeli, is in Poland on a visit. Regine, a Parisian, is contacted by a Lithuanian man who makes a fantastic claim. Vera, a Russian who has immigrated to Israel, encounters Rivka, a stranger who shares her surname.

What do they have in common apart from Holocaust memories? All three lived in Paris at one time or another, and by virtue of this fact, they seem to be related to each other. But are they?

This conundrum is never quite resolved, but like an enticing mystery novel, the viewer is swept along by the momentum of the suspense.

Composed of three separate but related segments, Voyages gets under way in Warsaw as Rivka meditates gloomily in a Jewish cemetery. The tourist bus she subsequently boards takes Rivka and her fellow travellers through what was once the Warsaw Ghetto.

On the way to Auschwitz, the bus breaks down. As they await help, Rivka and her husband quarrel. It's clear that they have not had a happy marriage. In Auschwitz, Rivka looks exceedingly distraught.

In the second segment, Regine is visited by a person from Vilnius (Vilna) who claims to be her long-lost father. He reminisces about his life. Is Regine his real daughter? Maybe, maybe not.

In the final episode, new Russian immigrants are taken to an absorption centre in Rishon Lezion. As the scene shifts, they congregate on a beach at sunset.

Vera has accompanied a neighbour to Israel, but leaves their apartment when his wife complains about their lack of privacy. She gets the message and departs for Tel Aviv, which is portrayed as a frenetic city with heavy traffic that never sleeps. There she searches desperately for a cousin.

Since Vera's Hebrew is non-existent, she speaks in Yiddish. To her frustration, few Israelis understand Yiddish. Lost and abandoned, she chances upon Rivka, who offers Vera hospitality.

The best segment in Voyages – which wrings convincing performances from its actors – focuses on Vera. The previous two are not strongly realized, leaving too many threads dangling. Yet all three parts are bound together by a seam of understated emotion.

Voyages, clearly, is a film where the journey, rather than the destination itself, counts most of all.

Schmigeggy producers put actors to the test

By ADAM SEGAL
CJN Intern

TORONTO — Inside a steamy loft on Yonge Street south of Bloor, four actors who do not know each other, have no script, few props and know only that "Mama" is the theme they are supposed to explore, are scrambling to put together a coherent play in three days.

Sounds like something only a "schmigeggy" producer would put actors through, right? Sort of.

Adam Lazarus and co-producers, Shannon Ruley and Sandra Waltman of Schmigeggy Productions, do not see themselves as schmigeggy's, but they do like to place actors in challenging situations.

"It heightens the creative tension," says Ruley, 24, a graduate of Macmaster University's theatre program. "When you're down to the wire, the best stuff comes out."

Playing on the comedy sketch concept popularized by Second City and television show Saturday Night Live, the actors are divided into pairs and allotted roughly 45 minutes to develop a sketch. The sketch is then acted out before the entire group, a script is written, and Lazarus gives feedback on how to touch it up before the performance so it is in line with the "Mama" theme.

And what is this "Mama" theme? Lazarus explains the play is attempting to show the various roles mothers have in society, from care giver to disciplinarian. It also pokes fun at the subservience the matriarchy has struggled with for centuries.

"Everyone has an idea of what a mother is," Lazarus says, and "we're trying to show all the possibilities" in roughly one hour.

Actors Hart Massey, Andrew Pifko, Ginette Mohr and Francesco Villecco (also a producer) agreed that what prompted them to audition was the spontaneous nature of the show.

"This is like creating music," says Massey, a graduate of the University of Toronto's drama program. "We try different things and even... if we look bad, at least we took that risk."

Although improvisation guided much of the preparation for the play, the final product, performed in front of 70 people packed tightly but comfortably in the loft, seems well rehearsed.

A scene in the principal's office, where an Italian mother simultaneously criticizes and defends her son for misbehaving, ignites howls of laughter, as does an elderly mother begging her now grown up son to stay at home.

Historical and biblical references add a clever and satirical dimension to the play. Queen Elizabeth, for instance, takes a son on a journey to 'Mother land' where he learns to appreciate all his mother has done for him.

In another hilarious scene, Moses, whose speech and mannerisms are strikingly similar to that of Woody Allan, develops tablets to help Mama discipline her children.

There are some shortcomings, though. The rushed nature of the production is evident in the play's lack of clarity and absence of character development.

At times, it is difficult to establish if the theme is about mothers, feminism or something else all together.

Lazarus hopes to make the production a bi-monthly venture. If future shows are as funny as this one, that won't be difficult.

The next show is slated for the end of August. For more information call Adam Lazarus at 416-963-4952.

COMIC JACKIE MASON SET TO FRET AGAIN UPON A TORONTO STAGE

With no target too sacred, Jackie Mason brings his popular comic shtick back to Toronto in November with Much Ado About Everything!, the show that he fine-tuned at a comedy club here last year before taking it to Broadway.

Mason turns his considerable wit on such contemporary targets as the Internet, tobacco companies, Bill Gates and Hillary Clinton. The former rabbi, who was literally laughed out of his Wisconsin pulpit, also delivers his vintage comic observations on the difference between Jews and Gentiles and other subjects.

Much Ado about Jackie Mason

Much Ado is presented by Jyll Rosenfeld, Fred Krohn and Jon Stoll in association with the Hummingbird Centre. Mason appears Nov. 14 thru Dec. 3 at the Toronto Centre for the Arts (formerly the Ford Centre), 5040 Yonge St. Tickets $75-$45. 416-870-8000. [www.ticketmaster.ca].

Song of Lilith: A trio of Canadian women artists are collaborating on an original multi-media work, A Song of Lilith, for performance Sept. 28 at the St. Lawrence Centre, Toronto.

Composer Larysa Kuzmenko, artist Lilian Broca and writer Joy Kogawa are among the recipients of $16,000 in grants from the Ontario and Toronto Arts Councils for the project, which focuses on the midrashic legend of Lilith, supposedly Adam's original helpmeet.

Lilith was "intelligent and felt equal to Adam," and all was fine between them "until Adam became arrogant and chose to dominate," a press release for the project explains. "Lilith could not conceive nor accept an oppressed situation," and so sprouted wings and escaped.

"Adam's second wife, Eve, was clearly his property — she was pulled out of his rib!" the press release continues. "She was a passive dreamer, feminine and compliant." This version of the tale continues with "a fascinating new 21st-century conclusion." Five musicians and an actor are scheduled to help bring it to life. Tickets, $25 & $20. 416-366-7723.

Literary Prize: When I Lived in Modern Times, a novel by Linda Grant about a Jewish Londoner who settles in British-ruled Palestine in 1946, has won the coveted Orange Prize for Fiction, valued at 30,000 British Pounds, or about $63,000 Cdn.

The novel is essentially a love story whose female protagonist, Evelyn Sert, becomes involved with the Zionist cause, and operates as a spy for the Irgun at the request of her lover.

Grant admits to visiting Israel only twice, once when she was 16 and again about two years ago, on a journalist assignment. The award was presented in June.

Berlin Jewish Museum will be open for business next year

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

BERLIN — Better late than never.

Berlin's long-awaited Jewish Museum, dogged by conceptual and mechanical problems, will finally open next year.

Even as workers upgrade the air-conditioning system and install miles of new cabling, and curators assemble the panoply of exhibits, some 200,000 visitors already have streamed through this striking, futuristic building, designed by the American architect Daniel Libeskind.

As they wander through its stark black and white corridors on guided tours conducted in German and English, visitors come up against spaces which resemble dark voids and staircases which end abruptly and lead nowhere, much like a surrealistic Salvador Dali painting.

The eeriness, symbolic of the unpredictability of Jewish history and the horrors of the Holocaust, is deliberate.

Nestled in a bland middle-class neighbourhood in eastern Berlin, near the site of what was Checkpoint Charlie before the fall of the Berlin wall in 1989, the $60 million museum-cum-learning and resource centre will portray the uneven course of Jewish life in Germany from the ninth century onward.

In the works for 12 years, it was originally planned as a division of the Berlin Museum to highlight the growth, accomplishments and tragedies of Berlin's historically illustrious Jewish community.

But as the concept evolved, planners resolved to build a museum on a much grander scale, explained spokesperson Eva Soderman.

"There are many Jewish museums in Germany," said Soderman, a historian whose post-graduate thesis explored the relationship between American Jews and the State of Israel.

"But they each have a regional focus. This one will be national in scope, the only one of its kind in Germany."

According to Georg Heuberger, director of Frankfurt's Jewish Museum, the Jewish Museum in Berlin will be the largest of its kind in Europe.

Emphasizing that it will not be a Holocaust museum per se, Soderman said that it will concentrate on the following themes:

• The high points of Jewish life in Germany and Jewish-Christian relations.
• The assimilation and integration of Jews into German society.
• The successes and setbacks Jews encountered.
• The role of Jews in Germany's development as a modern nation.
• The pervasive pattern of anti-Jewish discrimination.
• The rise of Nazism, the marginalization and emigration of Jews, and the Holocaust.
• The regeneration of the Jewish community from 1945 to the present.

Although the museum is in possession of 10,000 artifacts, officials have yet to decide which ones will actually be displayed.

The holdings consist of ceremonial and historical objects, portraits of Jewish notables, a Judaica collection amassed by the late Zvi Sofer, paintings by Jewish artists, archival material and documents, books, photographs and family memorabilia, as well as the Loewenhardt-Hirsch Palestine collection of maps and drawings of Jerusalem and Palestine from the 15th century onward.

However, the museum is still looking for additional mementoes – photos, letters, diaries, passports, identity papers, family trees, medals, awards, company brochures, catalogues, toys, china – that attest to the Jewish presence in Germany.

If you wish to lend or donate mementoes, contact the museum. Fax: 0049-30-25993-409. E-mail: archive@jmberlin.de.

And if talks succeed, the museum, headed by former U.S. secretary of the treasury Michael Blumenthal, may also be the repository of an immense video history of the Holocaust owned by filmmaker Steven Spielberg.

In its capacity as a learning and resource centre, the museum will host symposia, screen films and offer public lectures, musical and theatrical events, commemorative programs and children's and family activities.

Once it opens, Soderman disclosed, it expects about 500,000 visitors annually.

"We want to reach out to all Germans," she said, adding that a good proportion of visitors probably will be tourists from outside Germany.

"We took a survey and discovered that Germans know little about German-Jewish history before the Holocaust. Very few Germans have come into contact with Jews, so there is a great curiosity."

Clearly, the Jewish Museum will fulfil an exceedingly important role.

Fred Leuchter "Mr. Death" film now out on video

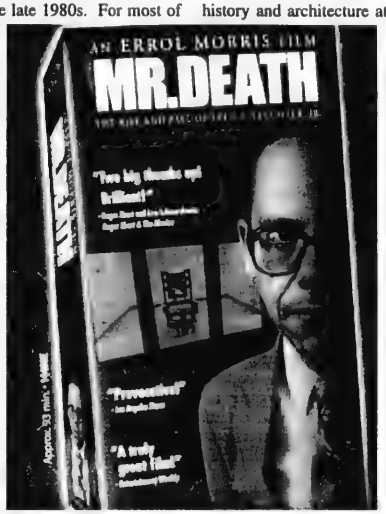
By LARRY ANKLEWICZ
Special to The CJN

Mr. Death: The Rise and Fall of Fred A. Leuchter, Jr., now available on video, has a special resonance for Toronto audiences.

Most residents of Toronto remember the second Ernst Zundel trial held in this city in the late 1980s. For most of us it was a long and torturous experience that eventually saw Zundel convicted of spreading hate literature, although the conviction was eventually overturned on a technicality.

That trial featured the testimony of Leuchter, upon whom this thought provoking documentary centered. At some point in the film, Leuchter appears so simplistic and naive that his comments provoke gales of laughter. At other times he seems so ignorant that you almost feel sorry for him.

As the film opens, Leuchter explains that he makes his living by designing and constructing devices to execute people. He tells us that he builds better electric chairs, which allow executions to be carried out in a more humane manner. And after his success with electric chairs, he expanded his business by designing new and improved gas chambers, lethal injection devices and gallows.



The centre piece of the film is Leuchter's employment by Zundel in 1988 to travel to Auschwitz in order to investigate the gas chambers there and report on whether they were used to execute Jews. So we see Leuchter making his way to Poland, entering the ruins of the gas chambers and happily chiselling pieces of concrete and brick off the interior walls.

He carefully puts his chips into baggies and brings them back to the United States to have them analyzed. His conclusions were that gas chambers never existed in Auschwitz.

Then we see Robert Jan van Pelt, who teaches cultural history and architecture at the University of Waterloo, who points out that all Leuchter had to do was visit the archives at Auschwitz and he could have looked at the plans for the construction of the gas chambers. This is something Leuchter did not do. And James Roth, manager of the laboratory that analyzed the chips Leuchter brought back from Auschwitz, completely demolishes Leuchter's conclusions in a few seconds of screen time.

Zundel gives the film some added relevance and humour in a short clip where he claims the prosecutor at the trial was shaking in his boots when Leuchter came into the courtroom to testify. I giggled at this piece of information. It just so happens that I know the prosecutor in that trial quite well and I have difficulty picturing him being frightened by Leuchter. In fact, the opposite seems more likely.

And Leuchter himself seems to be lost in a world of his own. He appears to have no comprehension of the consequences of his actions and no idea of what he is doing a large part of the time. Whenever he leaves his own little world and enters the real world, he seems to get into trouble.

After the Zundel trial, Leuchter had his engineering credentials challenged, lost his business, his home and even his wife. At the end of the film, Leuchter seems to be a pathetic character, unable to comprehend how his own actions precipitated this situation. Although somewhat disturbing, Mr. Death is a fascinating film to watch.

Russians perform at fund-raiser concert

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A new women's group that formed after the murder of 15-year-old Matti Baranovski, recently held its first fund-raising event, including a silent fine art auction and concert, in co-operation with UJA FEDERATION.

The Russian Jewish Initiative is composed of 40 professional women, some of whom have been in Canada for 20 years or more. Its members include physicians, lawyers, social workers and business executives.

Russian Jewish dancers from the Victory Dance Studio and circus performers from the Wonderful Circus World were among those who performed.

A large number of volunteers at the event, held at Leah Posluns Theatre, were first generation Canadians, children of group members.

"We came together to help Ruthie Baranovski, [Matti's] mother, to show our support," said executive member Mila Voihanski, director of immigrant services, Jewish Immigrant Aid Services.

Among the classical musicians who contributed their talents were Mark Skazinetsky, first violinist of the Toronto Symphony; Alexander Tselyakov; Marina Surgan; and Igor Emelianov.

The only non-Russian performer was violinist Rebecca Brenner, a nine-year-old from Hungary, who played separately and with Skazinetsky, her teacher.

Another youngster in the spotlight was 10-year-old pianist Alexander Seredenko, son of Larisa Pashanov and Serguel Seredenko, members of the Baroque Jazz trio, who headlined the jazz part of the program.

Other artists performing were singers Aelita, Eduard Rubin, Liora Raivich, and accompanist Angela Boutchko.

Members of the Association of Russian Artists donated 35 paintings of different genres to the auction, while other paintings, mostly oils, were donated privately.

Ambition drives the queen of the specialty channel

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Phyllis Yaffe is the queen of the specialty channel, and her kingdom is expanding.

President of Alliance Atlantis Communications' broadcasting division, the 51-year-old Toronto-based executive oversees the activities of History Television, Showcase, Life Network and Home & Garden Television.

These channels, which have acquired a loyal following throughout Canada, could be followed by many more if the Canadian Radio and Television Commission (CRTC) cooperates.

"We've applied for a do-it-yourself channel, a book channel, a health channel and a British Broadcasting Corporation Canada channel," disclosed Yaffe.

In addition, she plans a joint venture with the National Geographic channel, and wants to Canadianize the Food Network, represented by Alliance Atlantis in this country.

Nothing short of ambitious, Yaffe hopes to be running 30 channels, some on the Internet, within about five years.

Virtually unknown not too long ago, specialty channels are the new kid on the block in the TV broadcasting industry. In the last few years, they have experienced tremendous growth – there are about 55 in English and French across Canada today – and Alliance Atlantis, a public company, has benefitted from this development.

Yaffe hopes to run 30 channels

"All four of our channels are profitable, thank goodness," said Yaffe, "though they were not in the first year or two. And we've had excellent audience growth."

By Yaffe's estimation, 40 percent of Canadian viewers watch specialty programs, and 80 percent tune in to Alliance Atlantis' channels.

Offering a blend of movies, biographies and original historical programming from Canada and around the world, History Television, with almost four million viewers each week, is ranked as one of the most popular channels of its kind.

In recent months, History Television has introduced new programs such as Ancient History Tuesdays, History of War Thursdays and Dictators Week, featuring profiles on the likes of Saddam Hussein, Adolf Hitler and Joseph Stalin.

Showcase, which is devoted to Canadian and international movies and plays, plans to air more original dramas.

Life Network specializes in a wide range of lifestyle programming. It launched a new series, Real Life Stories, recently.

Meanwhile, Home & Garden Television remains Canada's sole 24-hour show of its kind.

Yaffe was appointed head of Alliance Atlantis' broadcasting division in May 1999, six years after she succeeded in persuading the CRTC to grant the firm its first speciality channel, Showcase.

"The idea behind Showcase was compelling to the CRTC," she recalled. "And besides, the dial wasn't full."

In 1996, she led the application team for History Television.

While working her magic before the CRTC, Yaffe was chair of the Ontario Science Centre's board of trustees, a position she held from 1992 to 1998.

"It was a fantastic experience. I got a chance to play in a world I didn't know anything about. The Science Centre is one of Toronto's celebrated treasures."

During her term, the Science Centre completed the largest capital program in its history, adding an Omnimax theatre, two restaurants and a banquet facility. Yaffe therefore contributed to revamping the centre for the next century.

Before the Science Centre beckoned, Yaffe developed the Foundation to Underwrite New Drama for Pay Television, now known as the Harold Greenberg Fund, on behalf of The Movie Network.

"The Harold Greenberg Fund is very important to the script-writing community in Canada," said Yaffe, a self-described cultural nationalist who believes Canadian culture is under-appreciated by Canadians, but prized abroad.

To the best of her knowledge, the fund has generated scripts for more than 100 movies.

Prior to her involvement in Canadian cinema, Yaffe was vice-president of marketing at Owl Communications, which publishes Owl and Chickadee magazines and produces children's television.

Phyllis Yaffe

Then she was executive director of the Association of Canadian Publishers, which was formed by Canadian-owned book publishers.

For three years, from 1977 to 1980, Yaffe was the first director of The Children's Book Centre, which was created to promote Canadian children's books.

She thinks she made a difference. When she started, less than one percent of children's books sold in Canada were printed here. The figure now is about 33 percent.

Yaffe, who was born and raised in Winnipeg, is the younger daughter of Louis and Yetta, and was originally a librarian.

"I stumbled into it," said Yaffe, who studied at the University of Manitoba. Armed with a degree in English literature, she followed her late father's advice and applied for a job at city hall. "There was a position vacant at the library. I loved it."

Eventually, she studied library science at the University of Alberta and the University of Toronto, and worked at the Winnipeg Public Library and Seneca College in Toronto.

Yaffe is convinced that library science prepared her for broadcasting. "It taught me how to be organized and to do research. It also taught me the value of information and the role of service in an organization. I believe in servicing the public. That's the best way of building loyalty."

Yaffe works hard, usually arriving at her desk by 8:30 a.m. and not leaving before 7 p.m.

"I love my work. It keeps me busy, and busy is good."

Yaffe has risen to the top by virtue of intelligence, talent and punishing hours. Yet her success can also be ascribed to the federal government's equity program.

"When I started in the broadcasting industry, the government was already regulating it [to help women gain employment in the field]. I might have had a harder time selling shoes."

She and her husband, John Feld, a writer from Winnipeg, have one daughter, Sarah, a student at McGill University. Her siser Carla is a Reform rabbi in New York City.

'Israel was a mystery, fraught with exaggeration'

Condemned at home, visiting Algerian journalists see themselves as pioneers

By JOSEPH ALGAZY
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM – "When I was invited to visit Israel, I thought it an interesting idea. To me, Israel was a mystery, a myth fraught with exaggeration, and therefore I very much wanted to get to know the people living there. I came here out of intellectual curiosity."

The speaker, Baya Gacemi, is one of the a group of Algerian journalists currently visiting Israel as guests of the Foreign Ministry.

Gacemi, 45, has for the past two years been an Algerian correspondent for the French weekly L'Express, and previously worked for the French-language Algerian Le Tribune newspaper, which she helped found.

"Israel exists and there is no reason why I should not visit it as I do other nations," she says. "Closed-mindedness and turning a blind eye will not solve the problems in Arab-Israeli relations. To find solutions to these problems, one must talk. Only after visiting Israel can I crystallize my views on Israel. Until now, I have had to rely on secondhand information from the media and the views of others."

Gacemi supports Palestinian aspirations for an independent state. "As for the details of how and under what terms, these are matters which only the Palestinians have the right to determine... All peoples have the right to exist and the right of sovereignty, the Jewish people do, and the Palestinians as well." Many in Algeria share her views, she adds.

One of Gacemi's more emotional meetings was with MK Hashem Mahameed (United Arab List).

"I was very surprised by his remarks," she said. "Mahameed emphasized that as a Palestinian Arab, he insists on his right to be a citizen of the state of Israel, and to enjoy full rights as such. When I asked him if he would move to a Palestinian state, when and if it came into being, he said no. He told us that he was born here and therefore would remain here. He added that the million Palestinian Arabs living in Israel will go on living here to struggle for full equality. At the same time they will express their identification with their brothers' struggle for freedom and a life of respect.

"I learned a lot from this statement. It would not be an exaggeration to say that if only for these remarks, I'm happy to have come here."

Visiting Yad Vashem left a shocking impression on Gacemi, in particular the sections describing the suffering of Jewish children in the Holocaust.

"I cried," she recalls. "I cannot stand it when any harm is done [to] children."

Gacemi, who describes herself as left-liberal, is critical of government policies in Algeria. While she opposes fundamentalist Islamic politics, she does not support the government's suppression of Muslim activists.

"I have always backed a political dialogue with the Islamic movements," she says. "I have therefore not been pleased by steps taken by President Abdelaziz Butaflika, who has declared a sweeping pardon for armed Islamic terrorists, some of whom were involved in murders, without bringing them to trial for their acts, and without holding a political dialogue with them.

"The president's steps have not put an end to the murders, and have not solved Algeria's fundamental problems. Within 10 years, new terrorist groups are liable to arise. The solution is dialogue and the establishment of true democracy – which does not exist today in our country – and holding truly free elections."

Gacemi says Algerian women continue to suffer from discrimination. "Women can work, vote, and hold important political and social positions, even become cabinet ministers, but in daily life the man – the father, brother, husband – rules, and the woman must obey him. Algerian women are far from enjoying full equality."

In the Algerian press, the journalists' visit has elicited mixed commentary.

"There were those who viewed it as a brave move, and that we should visit Israel to get to know it. Others described it as betrayal. Some warned us of potential problems, perhaps with the authorities as well. But we were not deterred. The fact is that we are here," says Gacemi.

The Algerian government condemned the journalists' visit, terming the members of the delegation traitors. "The journalists have lost their sense of patriotism. They rushed to Tel Aviv, even though they were not authorized to speak for the Algerian people or its government," the official Algerian news agency said.

But the government's announcement was attacked by the influential Algerian newspaper Al Vetan. The newspaper said it sent five journalists to Israel between 1992 and 1998, and called it scandalous that the president "learned of this just recently."

Gacemi says, "a year or two ago I would not have believed that I would visit Israel, and here it's happened. The visit indicates a turning point. One could say we are pioneers. I believe that others will follow in our footsteps."

Israeli skater takes career to the Max

"My knees were kind of weak... My heart was pounding," Birbraer said of his draft selection. "It's just a great honour to be drafted by the Devils."

His parents back in Israel were almost as emotional. "My mom was crying and my dad was very happy," Birbraer said. "He didn't sleep all night."

In a moment of calm in the midst of his hectic, 11-month hockey season, Birbraer looked back on the unique path that had taken him a few steps away from an NHL career. Sitting around the pool at the home of Paul Rosen, his legal guardian and the man who brought him to Canada to develop his hockey skills, he had only a short time to relax before he and Rosen flew to Israel for a family visit.

Hopefully this time, he'll manage to avoid arrest at the airport and going to jail, as he did last year. But more about that later.

After a planned 10-day visit in Israel and a week or two off in Toronto after he returns, he'll be back on the ice to get himself ready for the Devils' rookie camp. He plans to attend Nikolai Borschevsky's hockey camp for elite players and get into the shape of his life.

Birbraer met with team management after his selection and knows what is expected of him. He's been told to expect to spend the upcoming season playing in the American Hockey League for the Albany River Rats, the Devils' farm team.

Birbraer knows there are parts of his game that need improving, particularly his defensive play. In Albany "I'll get more ice time with big guys, with pros. I have no experience at the pro level."

After that, it's up to him.

Although he was raised in Kazakhstan, his early hockey career seems very Canadian. When Birbraer was six, his grandfather, Anatoly, bought him his first pair of skates and got him playing.

"He's the hugest hockey fan ever," Birbraer said. "He knows everything about his team, Torpedo Ust-Kamenogorsk. He attended almost every practice I was in, never mind the games. He supported me until I was 15. He drove me to almost every game. He was really sad when we left."

What's more, "my grandfather taught me the hockey mentality: Never give up. Keep digging."

Birbraer was among Kazakhstan's top young players for his age group – boys born in 1980. His teammate and school chum was Nikolai Antropov, who now plays for the Toronto Maple Leafs. Antropov centred the team's first line, Birbraer the second unit. When they were kids, their team participated in several all-Soviet finals, usually finishing around fourth, fifth or sixth.

At 15, Birbraer's life took a drastic turn. In Kazakhstan, Jews were subject to discrimination and so, to avoid trouble, the family lived under Birbraer's grandmother's maiden name. By 1996, they'd had enough and they decided to move to Israel, taking up residence in the Tel Aviv area. Birbraer had heard there were rinks in Israel so he took his hockey equipment along "for fun."

Within days of arriving in Israel, he was contacted by Russians who ran the Israeli hockey league. They recruited him to play for Rishon le Zion, and a few months later, he was placed on the national Under-20 junior team that represented Israel at a tournament in Sofia, Bulgaria. That tournament was marked by a bench-clearing brawl when Israelis responded to repeated anti-Semitic taunts by Yugoslav players.

A month later, Birbraer was in Yugoslavia for a tournament involving Israel's Under-18 team. That's when Rosen, a Torontonian who served as an assistant coach and equipment manger for the team, asked him to come to Canada to continue his hockey career.

"I was happy," Birbraer recalled. "I always wanted to go to Canada. In Kazakhstan, no one came to scout."

Rosen had watched the Israelis practise in Belgrade. "I saw really bad players, but there was this tall, lanky guy and the first thing that blew me away was how he could skate. In the first game, I saw some of his moves and it blew me away. I knew he could play and be a North American player."

Max Birbraer (left) with his friend Paul Rosen, who recruited him to play in Canada.

Simeon Yakubovitch, the Israeli coach, knew he had a diamond in the rough as well. In one game against Bulgaria, he played Birbraer for 56 out of 60 minutes, Rosen recalled.

With Birbraer's parents' permission, Rosen became Max's legal guardian and began looking for a team for him to play on. Genya Feldman, another Russian-born Israeli hockey player who was living in Canada, hooked Birbraer up with the OHA's Shelburne Wolves for the 1997-98 season.

"It was a terrible team, but Max put up good numbers right away," Rosen said.

"I had no trouble adjusting" to the Canadian game, Birbraer added.

When Shelburne folded, Birbraer was assigned to Newmarket, a much better team that received a lot more exposure.

By then, Max was lighting up the goal lights around the league. This past season, he scored 50 goals and 82 points in 47 games and fans filled arenas around the league to see him play. Although a natural left-winger, Birbraer played all three forward positions for Newmarket. And his game improved by leaps and bounds.

"He's got an all-round game," Rosen said. "The great thing is that he can adapt. He's a European who can play like a Canadian."

At 6-foot-2, 195 pounds, Birbraer has the size and speed to play any style. He can fly and he can handle the rough going.

Larry Bloch, a former Junior A player and a member of the senior Israeli team at the 1997 Pool D championships in Andorra, saw Birbraer play at that tournament as a backup defenceman.

"I've seen Max for the last 3½ years playing for the national team, junior, men's [pickup] hockey. His game has gone from here [holding his hand low] to here [hand held high]. His skating has improved so much."

Birbraer has played pickup summer hockey with OHL players and minor league pros and "he's turned them inside out," Bloch said. "He's really strengthened himself on his skates. You can't knock him off his feet."

Birbraer was scouted by most NHL teams in Newmarket and he was drafted slightly ahead of his overall ranking.

Despite his devotion to his hockey development, Birbraer usually finds a month each year to visit his parents in Israel. In March 1999 when he returned to Israel to renew his passport, he was arrested at the airport. Israeli authorities asked him, "Where were you? We've been waiting for three months for your military service," he recalled.

After a summary hearing, Birbraer spent three weeks in jail. He was released in time to fly to South Africa to represent Israel at an IIHF tournament there. When he returned to Israel, he completed three months of army basic training before the "hockey federation pulled some strings and got me out."

Now he is free to pursue his dream of a career in the NHL.

"I feel very confident that I can step up right now and play in Albany. All I can say is that I'll work my butt off."

No doubt his grandfather is very proud.

About Food

Dear Norene

By NORENE GILLETZ

Grilled food tastes great! When the weather turns warm, outdoor cooking is popular. However, it's not the healthiest way of eating. Typical barbecue fare usually features hot dogs, burgers, steaks and chicken, with less emphasis on vegetables and grains.

Leaner cuts are a healthier choice because fat often creates smoke fires, and smoke is full of cancer-causing substances. According to the American Cancer Society, research suggests that cooking meats at very high temperatures creates chemicals (heterocyclic amines, or HAs) that might increase cancer risk.

Here are some helpful barbecuing tips from their nutrition director, Colleen Doyle.

Cook the meat thoroughly, but not so much that pieces are charred and black. Keep the portions small and lean. Trim away any excess fat. Think of meat as a side dish instead of the main course. Try pre-cooking the meat in the oven or on the stove ahead of time, then finish it up on the grill. Don't eat any charred or blackened parts. Enjoy grilled meats with plenty of vegetables, fruits and grains.

Grain-based salads are a great accompaniment for your next barbecue. Prepare a big batch of rice, bulgur, couscous or pasta. When it's cool, add chopped green onions, coloured peppers (red, green, yellow), a handful of fresh herbs (minced dill, basil) and some cherry or grape tomatoes. Add a splash of your favourite salad dressing; season to taste with salt and pepper. Chill thoroughly.

You can "veg-out" at your next barbecue with this easy Mediterranean-style dish. Enjoy!

NANCY GORDON'S GRILLED VEGETABLES

- 1 large sweet onion, cut in chunks (e.g. Vidalia)
- 3 peppers (red, green and/or yellow), cut in chunks
- 8 oz. whole mushrooms (or sliced portobella mushrooms)
- 1 zucchini, trimmed and cut in chunks
- 12 to 16 asparagus spears, ends trimmed (optional)
- 2-3 tbsp. olive oil
- 2 tbsp. balsamic vinegar
- Salt and pepper, to taste
- 6 oz. (about 3/4 cup) feta cheese, crumbled (optional)
- 1/4 cup fresh basil, thinly sliced

In a large bowl, combine onions, peppers, mushrooms, zucchini and asparagus. Add oil and vinegar. Season with salt and pepper. Marinate at least 30 minutes or refrigerate overnight. Transfer vegetables to a grill basket, reserving marinade. Grill for 15 to 20 minutes, or until nicely browned. Remove from grill. While still hot, mix veggies with reserved marinade, cheese and basil. Makes 4 servings.

Iran verdicts evoke shock, dismay

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

Across Canada, shock, outrage and dismay greeted the verdicts in the trials of the Iran 13, with Foreign Minister Lloyd Axworthy expressing his government's "grave concern" over the "seriously flawed" proceedings.

The reaction from Ottawa mirrored sentiments in other world capitals. Israel, Britain and France all condemned the verdicts. U.S. President Bill Clinton said he was "deeply disturbed" by the Revolutionary Court's decision, and called on Iran to "overturn these unjust sentences."

In Jerusalem, Prime Minister Ehud Barak said in a statement that "Israel condemns the serious convictions that were given to innocent people."

Of the 13 Jewish defendants, two received prison sentences of 13 years; eight were sentenced to terms of four to 11 years; and three were acquitted. Of the eight Muslim defendants, two received prison sentences of two years; two were acquitted; and four remain on trial.

Further coverage pages 8, 9 and 22

Many activists compared the 11-week, closed-door trial with the anti-Semitic blood libels of the 19th century and the Stalinist show trials of the 1930s.

Jewish leaders worldwide vowed to redouble their efforts in the wake of the convictions of the 10, whom many believe were found guilty not of spying for Israel, but simply for being Jews.

In this country, community leaders are urging stepped-up public events, rallies, petitions and letter writing. This past Monday, protests and vigils were scheduled to take place in most major Canadian cities as part of an international day of solidarity with those convicted and with the entire Iranian Jewish community, now said to be under a pall of panic and fear.

The News in Brief

CANADA

Zundel Case Dismissed

OTTAWA — The Supreme Court of Canada has decided not to hear pro-Nazi publisher Ernst Zundel's appeal of an Ontario court ruling which said he could not sue parliamentarians for their refusal to let him use a press conference room on Parliament Hill. Moshe Ronen, president of Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) said the Supreme Court "rightly decided not to hear a frivolous case such as this one." In 1998, Zundel was denied permission to use a room on Parliament Hill based on an all-party motion banning him. He had intended to speak against the Canadian Human Rights Tribunal hearings examining his Web site. Earlier this year, an Ontario court ruled he could not sue federal parties or individual MPs who had voted to have him banned.

UN Slams Ontario

UNITED NATIONS — A United Nations report that ranked Canada the best country in which to live nevertheless criticizes Ontario for not complying with a UN finding that the province discriminates by not funding non-Catholic religious schools. The UN's annual Human Development Index notes that it does not include religious discrimination among its criteria for ranking, but rather looks at things like adult literacy rates and school enrolments. A chapter in the report slams Ontario for misusing the index to justify its failure to comply with last February's UN finding. Jewish activists hailed the section of the report, and repeated their call for Queen's Park to fund private and faith-based schools.

Concert Cancelled

KINGSTON — A planned Canada Day rock concert organized by the white supremacist Heritage Front was cancelled in the midst of massive media coverage and threats of anti-racist protest. Anti-racism activists from across Ontario had planned to confront patrons of the event, which was to feature four skinhead bands. The concert was abruptly cancelled, apparently after the bands, who were promised an event free of anti-racism activists, refused to play when it appeared there might be a confrontation.

Kessler Takes Over

WINDSOR — Harvey Kessler has been named the new executive director of the Windsor Jewish Federation. Kessler has worked at the United Way and the Canadian Hearing Society. His responsibilities will include I.L. Peretz House, a seniors apartment building; the Jewish Community Centre; and the annual United Jewish Appeal campaign.

ISRAEL

Rabbis Mobilize

JERUSALEM — Some rabbis in Israel are reportedly mobilizing to prevent the integration of women into army combat positions. The Israeli daily Ha'aretz reported that the rabbis believe the move could harm the "sensibilities" of religious male soldiers.

Hitting the Jackpot

JERUSALEM — A woman from Israel has won what is believed to be the largest-ever online casino jackpot. A woman identified as Sharon P. won $171,975.53 (US) from King Solomon's Online Casino earlier this month. She had placed a $3 bet.

WORLD

Aid for Torched Shul

NEW YORK — The umbrella organization for North American Jewish federations is donating $20,000 to a Conservative synagogue in Jerusalem that was set on fire June 24. Ya'ar Ramot, a congregation that many suspect was targeted by haredi Jews, will receive funds from the United Jewish Communities to cover repairs and install a security system.

Survivor Appointed

WARSAW — An Auschwitz survivor named by Israel as Righteous Among the Nations has been appointed Poland's foreign minister. Wladyslaw Bartoszewski, 78, also took part in the 1944 Warsaw Ghetto uprising and spent years building Polish-Jewish relations.

Wants Name Removed

NEW YORK — An American Jewish leader is insisting his name be removed from an open letter critical of Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Barak. Neal Sher, the former executive director of the American Israel Public Affairs Committee and a consultant to Canada's war crimes department, said he was unaware that the letter would be so critical of Israeli policy.

War Crimes Setbacks

VILNIUS — A Lithuanian court has indefinitely halted the country's first Nazi-era war crimes trial. The judge cited the poor health of the 93-year-old defendant, Aleksandras Lileikis, who is accused of handing over at least 75 Jews to Nazi death squads. Also last week, a medical commission in Lithuania found that a 92-year-old suspected war criminal is mentally unfit to stand trial. A court will rule this fall on how to proceed with the trial of Kazys Gimzauskas, also accused of handing over Jews to Nazi death squads.

Mossad Agent Goes on Trial

LAUSANNE, Switzerland — Switzerland's highest court is forcing Israel's Mossad to relive one of its most embarrassing episodes.

Last week, the Federal Court began trying a Mossad agent for his role in a botched wiretap attempt. The defendant is being tried under a pseudonym, Isaac Bental.

Bental was one of five Mossad operatives caught red-handed in February 1998 while attempting to bug an apartment near the Swiss capital, Bern. The apartment belonged to a businessman with suspected links to the Islamic fundamentalist group Hezbollah. Local police released the other four agents.

When the bugging attempt was made public, red-faced Israeli officials posted nearly $1 million in bail for Bental and issued a public apology to Switzerland. Bental returned to Israel in April 1998 on condition he return for the trial.

Bental, who has admitted his role in the incident, faces charges that include espionage and carrying out illegal acts for a foreign state. The espionage charge alone carries a jail sentence of up to four years.

Chaplains help people cope with life, death issues

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Watching Rabbi Nachum Berlat trying to negotiate his way around the Baycrest Centre is like watching a politician wade through a pre-election crowd. Everyone wants a piece of him, to greet him, shake his hand, exchange pleasantries. And Rabbi Berlat is glad to oblige.

Special Feature

As director of pastoral care at the geriatric facility, Rabbi Berlat seems to know just about every one of the centre's 1,000 residents, and most of its staff as well.

He's an "out there" personality, shmoozing with people in the hallways and cafeteria, delivering one-liners and quips like a borscht-belt comedian. The people seem to love it and he's affectionately known on his home turf as Bugs Ben Bunny Halevi Shlita Meor Hagezer, which roughly translated means, Bugs the son of Bunny the Levite, the Exalted Light of the Carrot.

It's clear that if the New York native ever wants to give up his present gig as chaplain, he would have no problem doing stand up. The lines come fast and furious. But for all its humour, his Loony Tunes title has a more serious connotation. As the rabbi explains it, Bugs Bunny has become the theme of his chaplaincy because like the cartoon character, Rabbi Berlat has "big ears" – he's a good listener.

Listening to others a key part of the job

Listening to others is a key component of his work as a chaplain, he explains. At the Baycrest Centre, where the average age is 87, there are plenty of people with plenty of tzuris who would like nothing better than to talk about them.

"Most of the work I do is facilitating persons using their spiritual strength to fight life's issues," he said. "I'm a listener. The biggest tools I have are my ears. That's what I tell my students. I tell them to listen to what [others] are saying and see what they really mean."

Working in an institutional setting in which he ministers primarily to the elderly (as well as to staff), Rabbi Berlat faces a unique set of issues. Many residents face serious illness and death; some are so old, they are in grief after outliving their children; some suffer from loneliness; and Holocaust survivors, who comprise between 40 to 45 percent of Baycrest's residents, can suffer flashbacks to the wartime years. On one occasion, a survivor being transported in a wheelchair thought she was being taken to a gas chamber when an elevator door slammed shut too quickly, Rabbi Berlat said.

That's when a chaplain's empathic nature must kick in, he explained. "You sit with the people, reassure them, tell them they're safe, remain with them until the episode passes."

Sometimes it takes a small effort to make a big impact. On one occasion, a Baycrest resident invited the rabbi to share her apple. Rabbi Berlat, who apparently can't say no to anyone, agreed to do so. He later learned from a social worker just what his time with her meant.

The woman had spent her later years alone in a downtown rooming house. She used to call 411 just to hear a human voice. Offering Rabbi Berlat part of her apple was her way of asking him to sit down and simply talk to her.

The way Rabbi Berlat sees it, "I bring the component of God and God's presence. When everything else is down, God is there as a constant in their lives. I become an ambassador of God's care to people."

As part of his responsibilities, Rabbi Berlat organizes religious education and provides halachic responses to ethical dilemmas.

Baycrest residents can participate in a twice-daily prayer minyans, while on Shabbat and holidays about 150 participate in prayers. On the High Holy Days and for Yizkor (memorial) services, that number can swell to 300.

Rabbi Berlat, who has three master's degrees, and a doctorate in pastoral counselling, is often called upon to present halachic views on numerous life and death issues. Among them are "the do not resuscitate issue, surgery, nutrition and hydration issues.

"I give views on the extent to which we go to preserve a life...We are on a real slope. If someone is in a lot of pain, we can ethically, halachically provide pain medication that may affect breathing, as long as the pain is relieved," he said.

Issues are addressed on a case by case basis. "The needs of the patient are primary and we attend to those first. But in the end, the families must make a decision, although they cannot request doctors and staff to act unethically," he said.

In addition, "We don't believe in either passive or positive euthanasia...Physician-assisted suicide is absolutely against Halachah."

Safeguarding the rule of law

From the editor's desk

Long before the first prohibition was enshrined into the regulations of continental canon law, or the first precedent embedded into the system of Anglo-Saxon common law, the hoary and wise sages of the Jewish people were dispensing justice on the benches of the Sanhedrin in Jerusalem, in the lower courts throughout the land of Israel and in the houses of judgment and academies of learning in Babylonia and the many other lands of the Jewish dispersion.

Of course, long even before that, in the electric atmosphere surrounding the gravelly, rock-strewn base of a low mountain in the Sinai Desert, the revolutionary, epoch-setting notion that justice and the rule of law are the bedrocks of governance was delivered to the world.

Justice and its necessary companion, the rule of law, are as endemic to the Jewish people as molecules of hydrogen and oxygen are to water.

Is it any wonder then, much as a beacon of light from a lighthouse draws wary travellers across dark and uncertain waters, that the pursuit of justice, the safeguarding of the rule of law and the protection of individual rights has drawn such great numbers of Jewish activists across the centuries?

At its core, the uproar over the arrest, conviction and sentencing of the Iranian Jews is about the pursuit of justice. Of course for Jews, there is a more patent poignancy in the uproar because of the transparency of the persecution of fellow Jews, once again, in the feeble guise of a trial of guilt or innocence.

The fates of the 10 convicted Jews have been settled; but the arrests and the trial also show that in a real sense, the fate of the entire Jewish community in Iran is uncertain.

Irwin Cotler, MP, one of the world's pre-eminent guardians of the rule of law, issued a statement last week concerning the 10 convictions in Iran. Cotler pointed out that the "convictions violated rights guaranteed under both Iranian law and the international Covenant of Civil and Political Rights to which Iran is a party."

Some of the violations he listed were:

• No official charges of any kind were ever made public or even confided to the accused, thereby denying the defendants the right to know and to make full answer and reply to the charges.

• There was no evidence implicating the defendants in any crime other than the illegally coerced "confessions."

• Prior to the trial itself the defendants were illegally imprisoned incommunicado for over a year, a flagrant violation of the Iranian Criminal Procedure Code.

• The defendants were subjected to adverse and prejudicial trial publicity. For example, the Teheran Times, on the eve of the trial, excoriated the Jews, a vulnerable religious minority in Iran, for perpetuating the "biggest fraud of the outgoing century – the Holocaust."

• The defendants were denied the right to a public trial before an independent judiciary.

• The defendants were denied a fundamental principle of justice – the presumption of innocence. Clerics and judges libelled and indicted the accused Shiraz Jews as "Zionist spies" even before the trial began.

In addition to his many roles and responsibilities, Cotler happens also to be the Special Counsel of the International Association of Jewish Lawyers and Jurists (IAJLJ), a non-governmental agency founded 31 years ago by some of the greatest legal scholars and practitioners in the Jewish world.

The safeguarding of the rule of law and the advancement of human rights are the animating forces behind the IAJLJ. Its membership consists of lawyers, judges, judicial officers and jurists in academia in more than 50 countries.

For the first time in the organization's history, it will be holding a conference in North America. In fact it will be meeting next month Aug. 13 to 16 in Toronto.The theme of the conference is: Pursuing Justice in the Global Village.

The trial and convictions of the Iranian Jews will undoubtedly occupy a high place on the agenda.

The motto of the IAJLJ is the biblical injunction, in Hebrew: "Tzedek, tzedek tirdof" (Justice, justice you must pursue.)

Justice is also the name of the organization's quarterly bulletin. It is always a treasure chest of important articles, commentaries and items of news.

The president of the IAJLJ, Judge Hadassah Ben-Itto, wrote a powerful statement of purpose in the Spring 2000 issue of the journal: "One of our main goals is addressing issues that are on the agenda of the Jewish people everywhere. We are particularly committed to combatting racism, xenophobia, anti-Semitism and the denial of the Holocaust…

"We must realize that racism, xenophobia and anti-Semitism do not start on the streets, exactly as wars do not start on the battlefield. They start in the minds of men. Long before they make their appearance on the streets or in the beer halls, they are well hidden away in books and in newspapers, in learned academic lectures and on television interviews. They are stamped on the minds of young people in the form of routine stereotypes…

"[They] are particular issues on the Jewish agenda which an association like ours is equipped to address, and which we, as Jews, cannot afford to ignore."

The IAJLJ conference in Toronto is shaping up to be a very important one.

Parents challenge CHAT Richmond Hill decision

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A meeting last Wednesday night intended by the board of directors of Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto (CHAT) to provide information about its new northern campus turned into an angry confrontation.

Pleas by CHAT president Baila Lubek and headmaster Paul Shaviv for support, cooperation and a positive outlook were countered by charges of misrepresentation, lack of communication, poor judgment and condescension.

The dispute centres around the opening of a second campus in Richmond Hill for the school. In September, students entering Grade 9 who live in the "L" postal code area (York Region) will begin their high school years there. An extra grade will be added each year.

The interim location of the northern campus of CHAT will be the former Richmond Hill High School, on Wright Street, near Yonge Street and Major Mackenzie Boulevard. The facility will be shared, at first, with Rivendell School, an independent school teaching the international baccalaureat program.

The intention is to eventually build at the new Jewish community campus at Bathurst Street and Weldrick Avenue.

Lubek explained that until March, the board had no reason to doubt that they would be able to implement Phase 2 of their expansion plans for the current building on Wilmington Avenue, which would have provided enough space for incoming students, at least until the new campus takes shape.

It wasn't until March, she said, that they were told not to bother applying for the necessary municipal zoning variances, because of strong opposition from local ratepayers and politicians.

Near the end of the meeting, Lubek acknowledged that perhaps the board should have informed the parents of the problem at that time.

After looking at a number of possibilities, among them, she later said, the vacant Sunnybrook store across the street, and Bathurst Heights Secondary School, they decided to renovate the basement of nearby Beth Jacob synagogue to provide five or six classrooms and office space. The decision was confirmed on June 6.

Lubek stressed that the Beth Jacob renovation "was barely enough to fill the needs for 2000-2001, let alone after that."

CHAT Richmond Hill, Lubek said, will "offer a full Grade 9 program, mirroring the full CHAT experience."

"We stand by our decision," she said.

Shaviv said the staff will be a "balanced team" of veteran and "young, dynamic teachers, many of them CHAT graduates," led by senior administrator Gary Levine, who would assume the title of vice-principal.

Levine, director of student activities at CHAT, has been responsible for many of the extra-curricular and non-academic elements at the Wilmington branch. Shaviv said.

An existing cafeteria will be made kosher.

The students will not have the same experience as those at the Wilmington campus, he said, "but it will be just as good."

The presentation by Lubek and Shaviv by no means satisfied most of the over 300 parents who attended the meeting. Several people called for the resignation of members of the board and hinted at applying for an injunction to prevent the new branch from opening.

Speakers were interrupted by shouts, applause or standing ovations.

A group of concerned parents represented by Mark Greenwald attempted unsuccessfully to present a position paper from the podium, but they were allowed to speak from microphones set up at either end of the room.

Their objections, echoed by many others, included lack of peer influence, greater capital cost, alienation from the rest of the student body as well as from the Jewish community, and the lack of extra-curricular life, especially because the youngsters will be bused to and from school.

The most frequently repeated complaint was the lack of communication between the board and the parents of incoming Grade 9 students, referred to several times as "misinformation."

Parents said that they and their children felt they were being cheated out of experiences they had not only been promised but that they had in many cases dreamed of.

"You made a promise, we agreed and signed and looked forward to. We had a contract," one frustrated parent said.

Demands for a meeting that same night, for an emergency meeting of the board and for reversing the decision were not accepted. Board chair Brian Lass said he plans to put together a "working group" to work with the upset parents, although he did not say exactly what would be worked on.

On Friday, the parents opposing the move sent The CJN a news release re-iterating their dissatisfaction.

Seymour Epstein, executive director of the Board of Jewish Education, said that while he felt badly that "the parents were disappointed – they felt they had been lied to," nevertheless the new campus is "a fait accompli, and we have to make our peace with it."

In an interview before the meeting, Alan Sandler, president of UJA FEDERATION, who was not able to be present, said that while UJA FEDERATION believes strongly that the community must accommodate all Jewish children who want to have a Jewish education, "we wouldn't have the chutzpah to interfere or try to influence how any institution, organization or school carries out its duties."

One grade always has to be the first at a new school, he said. "We have to take a deep breath, and decide how we can work with the school to make everything work."

Thornhill MPP addresses Reena

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The Ontario government has made major improvements to support people with developmental disabilities, said Tina Molinari at Reena's annual general meeting.

This year the provincial government committed $50 million for people with developmental disabilities, in addition to over $50 million committed last year, the Thornhill MPP announced recently at the Toby and Henry Battle Developmental Centre. "This is a priority of our government... it has become a personal priority of mine, as well."

The commitment is designed to help in four areas, she said:

• $30 million in new services to benefit 2,800 individuals and their families, including the creation of group living spaces for 300 individuals;

• a permanent $8 million increase in base funding;

• a $6 million grant to ministry-funded agencies to complete retrofitting required by the revised Ontario Fire Code; and

• an immediate $6.1 million to address human resource issues, such as staffing and wages, in agencies.

The latter amount will grow to $15.2 million next year, Molinari said.

"No one pretends that this announcement will solve every problem," she said. "What it will do is help address a lot of the problems now faced."

The government's goal, said Molinari, is to continue to foster integration.

She praised Reena as a North American leader in its field, helping its almost 1,000 clients realize their potential and treating them with dignity.

Among the 25-year-old agency's recent initiatives is Kids Club, a program for five to 12 year olds, and the Al and Faye Mintz Reena ElderHome, the agency's first. Its official opening will be held Sept. 26, announced Stan Kugelmass, outgoing Reena chair.

But Reena faces formidable challenges, he noted, citing, among other issues, the difficulty of retaining employees at relatively lower wages than those of their counterparts in other fields. "Years of financial cuts are catching up with us."

Reena client, Joe Feldman, left, accepts an Employee of the Year award from Ruth Ladovsky. [Frances Kraft photos]

Having advocated for more government resources, he believes those in government "want to hear from us. The voice of a parent or sibling, face to face, has an impact."

Reena ended the year with a deficit of about $50,000, less than the $60,000 projected last June, said Howard Ungerman, treasurer and incoming chair. For the previous two years, the deficit was $200,000.

Among the cost-cutting measures was the sale of Camp Reena, Ungerman noted. The ElderHome was completed on time and on budget, he added, noting that $1.5 million in fund-raising enabled the project to come to fruition.

Tina Molinari

Reena clients will be moving into the home this month, noted Harold Seidel, chair of Batay Reena, which deals with housing.

The evening included a number of volunteer recognition awards, as well as one each for Admar Promotions Group Inc. (Corporate Philanthropy), Supreme Foods (Employer of the Year) and Reena clients Larry Weinstein and Joe Feldman (Employees of the Year).

Paul Bonder, owner of Supreme Foods, accepted his award from Ruth Ladovsky for providing packaging and relabelling jobs to five Reena clients.

"Fridays have now taken on a new meaning for those clients. In some cases, this is the first regular paycheque they have ever earned," Ladovsky said.

"Like any new program, there were growing pains, but with staff support and patience, the program has flourished," she said. "The company has increased productivity."

Sound of the shofar rings through Mount Sinai

Rabbi Berlat is assisted in his work by an associate, Rabbi Asher Turin, and a trained group of 20 volunteers. Nevertheless, the job stresses are substantial. "I know that my responsibility is to try to enrich their lives and I don't get depressed, although I do cry with people," he said.

"I leave it here. And I have my hobbies. Ham radio is my hobby," he said, adding he consults with other chaplains when the pressures of the job get to him.

As Rabbi Berlat is called away to minister to one of his flock, Dr. Albert Kirshen, doctor of geriatric medicine and palliative care, who had joined us in the hospital cafeteria, offers this insight: "He will never tell you, but he's a saintly man. He has endless patience and nearly endless energy...The source of his strength is clearly his faith...He's a truly good man."

By this time, Rabbi Berlat has rejoined us and he's clearly embarrassed by Dr. Kirshen's glowing description. When asked to describe the best parts of his job, this is what he said:

"To see someone feeling better, to see someone smiling. For someone to say it's a good day today, that makes me feel good."

Kirshen and Rabbi Berlat are called away but another of Rabbi Berlat's friends, Andrew Cohen, a member of the rabbi's Bible study group, had joined us. He offers this view of the rabbi:

"We should have more like him," he said. "He's real...He's one of those people who shows derech eretz to everyone. I've learned a lot being with him."

Each autumn at the Mount Sinai Hospital, the beeps and whirs of high-tech medical devices are drowned out by a decidedly low-tech sound – the ancient and primal blast of the ram's horn.

For the hospital's many Jewish patients, the sound of a shofar on the High Holy Days is a welcome reminder of life outside the hospital.

As part of the chaplaincy services for Jewish patients at the downtown Toronto hospital, the shofar is sounded on all floors during Rosh Hashanah and Yom Kippur. The holidays are also marked – for those who can leave their beds – by shortened afternoon prayer services while on other holidays, Jewish patients are invited to participate in religious observances. During Purim, the megillah is read; during Passover, a "model seder" is held; and on a daily basis, patients, staff and visitors gather in the chapel to daven Minchah.

Co-ordinating the traditional religious observances at Mount Sinai is Rabbi Bernie Schulman, for the past six years chaplain to the Jewish patients at what has long been considered the city's "Jewish hospital." For Rabbi Schulman, seeing to Jewish patients' religious needs is one part of a multi-level job description that runs from mundane matters to offering advice on difficult ethical issues.

In a typical day, Rabbi Schulman may be called upon to lend moral support to families of patients who are ill or who have died, or he may be asked to outline the halachic implications of various medical procedures. Or he may simply be asked to provide electric Shabbat candles to make a patient feel more at home.

"Most of my time involves giving support to families," he said.

About 20 percent of the hospital's inpatient case load is Jewish and the number goes up when the outpatients are included. Holocaust survivors can be found in significant numbers and as they age, they can present unusual problems for hospital staff. Some survivors can flash back to the war years and imagine he or she is again in a concentration camp. Rabbi Schulman might then be called upon to counsel both the staff and the patient – to explain to the doctor or nurse what the patient is experiencing and to reassure the patient that he or she need not fear the medical staff.

The job includes many difficult moments. Comforting individuals when a family member is dying is "very stressful, but by being there you give help to them...One does feel the support is making a difference."

'Job includes many difficult moments'

Working in an environment where illness is all around can be difficult, but Rabbi Schulman has found his own coping mechanisms.

"I'm very often amazed that it doesn't do [bother me] more," he said. "I can go home, get into my personal life and leave it behind."

"It's rare that it wears on me...but sometimes I have to leave for two or three hours. A good portion of my vacation is half-days that I take off."

Rabbi Schulman, a native of Rochester, N.Y. who studied at Ner Israel Yeshivah in Baltimore and at Ner Israel in Toronto, says there are plenty of positive experiences to compensate for the rough times. "I saw a patient in intensive care and I wasn't sure I'd see him again. He was here for a number of weeks and got over his crisis period. I was rewarded by running into him on the street and I saw him looking handsome and dapper.

"That's part of the joy that gives you satisfaction on the job."

Shiraz charade

The trials in Iran of the 13 Jewish defendants may have ended, but the worry and concern for the future of the entire community begins now in earnest. The arrests, the imprisonments, the trials, the verdicts and finally, the sentences of the 10 convicted defendants are like a yellow star of David on the breast pockets of all 25,000 Jews in Iran, marking them as outcasts in their own communities, suspected, vulnerable and warned.

The western world has condemned Iran. But beyond condemnation, what should be the logical and the necessary next steps? Governments and community leaders are in a quandary.

Any "punitive" response to the trials, such as trade sanctions, many leaders argue, would be counterproductive. Such measures would merely harm innocent Iranians, further threaten the Jewish community and bolster the struggle of the"hardline" Islamic fundamentalist forces led by Ali Khameini against the so-called "moderate" forces of Mohammed Khatami. A "punitive" response on the part of western governments, many leaders argue, would simply aid the radical Khameini factions by lending proof to their wild charges of Jewish control of the West, worldwide Zionist conspiracy and Israeli subterfuge.

It is a strong argument against a "punitive" response and in favour of the traditional diplomatic one, namely wagging the western finger of disapproval by registering displeasure, demanding improvements, maintaining an increased watch, but essentially doing nothing.

The argument deserves to fail.

If there are no consequences to the actions of the Iranian government, it will not modify its behaviour. But is that not one of the key objectives of the civilized world in the circumstances – inducing the government of Iran to change its behaviour?

If there are no consequences to the actions of the Iranian government, it will conclude that these outrages against the vulnerable minorities can continue, unchallenged. Such a conclusion by Iran raises the spectre of even more alarming possibilities.

The response of the West must exceed the usual wagging of diplomatic fingers. It must be assertive and sharp. There must be palpable financial and diplomatic consequences, no matter the expected rhetoric from the Khameini forces. Iranian leaders must be isolated at all international venues. Trade with Iran must be severely restricted, if not barred, for a defined period of time.

The trials were a charade. But the fallout must be more than the familiar game of empty gestures.

Camp David revisited

As of this writing, Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Barak and PA Chairman Yasser Arafat are packing their bags for a summit meeting with U.S. President Bill Clinton in the storied woods of Camp David. Hoping to recreate the historic achievements that unfolded in that same place some 23 years ago, Clinton has decided to gamble that the seclusion of the setting, the intensity of the situation and the urgency of the hour will yield positive results. We hope he is right, for there is a grim sense of looming disaster spoiling the air above Jerusalem.

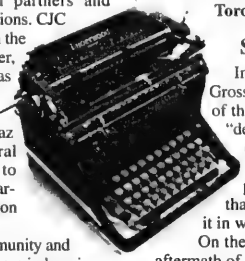
Denies alleged inaction on Iranians

I am writing in response to two letters that have appeared in the Canadian Jewish News: "We should be shouting" (June 8) and "Inaction over Iran intolerable" (June 22). Both decry alleged inaction over the situation of 13 Iranian Jews.

In fact, across Canada, Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) and other organizations have led and supported numerous community vigils and manifestations of solidarity with Iranian Jews and have circulated an international petition in co-ordination with the Conference of Presidents of Major Jewish American Organizations. In consultation with an international Working Group on Iran, CJC has also worked quietly but effectively over the last year in gaining support for the Iran 13 from our interfaith partners and international human rights organizations. CJC has maintained constant liaison with the Canadian government on this matter, and the minister of foreign affairs has demonstrated outstanding leadership in ensuring ongoing Canadian pressure both in Tehran and in Shiraz where the trials took place. Several MPs and senators who wished to express concern and solidarity in Parliament were assisted with information from CJC.



The campaign of the Jewish community and the related international pressures were in keeping with the wishes of the families of the accused and of the Jewish community of Iran, and they appear to have had some impact on events in this biased judicial process, if only to ensure that no death penalties were involved. We have been and continue to be mindful of the safety and security of the Iranian Jewish community as a whole.

CJC does not accept the guilty verdicts and the sentences meted out to 10 of the Jews by the revolutionary court because they are not just, although we are relieved that three are free to rejoin their families. We will be working with partners across Canada to raise this human rights issue in the public mind, to urge our government to continue to take moral leadership and to press for the immediate release of the prisoners.

Minister knows what she's doing

Stephen Stern of Ajax compares the forced return of the illegal Chinese would-be immigrants to the plight of the Jews who tried to leave Germany (Letters to the editor, CJN, June 29).

There is absolutely no comparison. When Jews were refused entry by just about every country in the world, we were tortured, gassed and persecuted. Our property was stolen, as is well documented. Even in Shanghai, China, where my parents and I spent 10 years, a ghetto was erected. After the war had ended in 1945, we had no place to go. Nobody let us in until we came to Canada as visitors in 1949. We spoke English well and were never a burden to the government.

The Chinese migrants are not being persecuted. They are coming to this country to seek a better life. They are not hounded or tortured and their property is not stolen by the regime. How anyone can compare the Jews of 1938 with the present day Chinese is beyond me. There is a legal way to enter. Being illiterate, perhaps these unfortunate souls don't know how, so they pay a lot of money to come here. Minister Elinor Caplan knows what she is doing.

Surprised at rabbi's letter

Imagine my surprise when Rabbi Zalman Grossbaum took offence at The CJN's editing of the release he sent, substituting the word "death" for "passing." (Letters to the editor, CJN, June 29) Is death so strong a concept that the rabbi needed a euphemism? Is it so overpowering an idea that he could not bring himself to express it in writing?

On the other hand, can it be a skirmish in the aftermath of the death of the Rebbe six years ago? Is it part of the battle equipment of those who say that he did not die but "passed" and will rise again? Where have we heard this before? I am greatly disappointed by what this reveals.

Correcting the record

I wish to correct an inaccuracy in the June 29 article about the recent Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Synagogue concert celebrating "1,000 Years of Yiddish." There was a statement purportedly quoting me, which read: "Most of those attending were grandchildren of Holocaust survivors who have learned to appreciate Yiddish from their bubbies and zaydes." What I actually said was: "Many who attended were grandchildren of early immigrants – those who came prior to and following the First World War – who lived in extended family households where they learned to speak and cherish Yiddish from their bubbies and zaydes."

For all who shared in this experience, the very sound of a Yiddish word or a Yiddish melody continues to open a treasury of family history.

Iran: how should the West respond?

By MICHAEL J. JORDAN
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

As the international community condemns the prison sentences given to 10 Iranian Jews, a growing chorus of Jewish politicians and activists is demanding that Iran somehow be punished.

The observant Jews were convicted for allegedly spying for Israel. Their sentences ranged from four to 13 years in prison.

But the demands for punishment raise several troubling questions:

• Would the use of sanctions – and the suffering they would cause to the Iranian people – actually deliver a victory to the Iranian hardliners, who seemed to orchestrate the entire trial precisely to damage the mild detente developing between Iranian reformers and the West?

• Should Western efforts to warm relations with strategically important Iran be derailed over the fate of 10 Iranian Jews?

• Would the further isolation of Iran only worsen the situation of the remaining 25,000 Jews in Iran – and Iranian society in general?

"It's a very delicate balance, and not a black-and-white situation," said Abraham Foxman, national director of the Anti-Defamation League.

"But if there are no consequences for Iran, you're saying it's OK."

In the wake of the verdicts, British Foreign Secretary Robin Cook has already postponed a planned trip to Iran.

Now, Israel and North American Jewish groups are pressing Germany to cancel a planned visit by Iranian President Mohammad Khatami, who was to arrive in Berlin next week.

Hamid (Dani) Teffilin, received a sentence of 13 years in prison.

Consideration of the potential unintended consequences of punitive steps against Iran should dominate any sanctions-related debate, say Iran-watchers and emigres in North America.

They suggest that in Iran, where fundamentalists still control the key levers of power – including the judiciary, the military, the police and, most importantly, the state-controlled television and radio – the hard-liners would frame any sanction, however small, in their typical "the-world-is-against-us" propaganda.

Sanctions could also weaken the position of Iranian reformers.

Though they recently won a majority in the Iranian legislature, the reformers are still embattled. In recent months, for example, 19 reformist newspapers have been shut down.

Sanctions could make their Western-friendly rhetoric more unpopular. More relevant to North American Jewry, blame could easily trickle down and exacerbate an already-tense climate for Iran's Jews.

The hard-liners "have used this trial to present these Jews as aggressors and spies, and [to suggest] that all Jews have hostile tendencies toward Iran," said Pedram Moallemian, a non-Jewish Iranian emigre who is director of a Toronto-based human rights group, the Canadian Iranian Centre for Liberty and Equality.

"Some sort of backlash or sanction would prove their point that Iranian Jews are working with the enemy" Moallemian said.

"And if there were, say, no milk for babies, Iranians looking to blame someone might find the easiest target to be the Jew on the street."

With that in mind, Jewish lobbyists know they must tread a fine line.

Malcolm Hoenlein, executive director of the Conference of Presidents of Major American Jewish Organizations said that with the verdict in, Jewish leaders will now begin "Phase 2" of the campaign on behalf of the Iranian prisoners.

While the pressure earlier was on the Iranian judiciary, now the spotlight will be on Khatami, the reformist.

"We know about the internal opposition and the problems, but now is the time for Khatami to act and undo this injustice," Hoenlein said.

A file photo of Javeed Beit Yakov kissing a member of his family some weeks before the verdict was delivered. Beit Yakov was sentenced to nine years in jail. [Kahl photos]

"We aren't looking to embarrass him or to create circumstances that will make it even more difficult for him to make moves. But this is a test case for him. He has to show whether he really is interested in reform."

Yet this, too, may only backfire for the West and potentially undermine whatever reform efforts are underway, Moallemian said.

"Even if there were support for such a thing, it would be used against the moderates to weaken them," he added.

"The propaganda machine is not in [the reformers'] hands. Any expectations of them taking such action would be unrealistic to say the least."

Moallemian also cautioned against any sanctions. Instead, he said, frustration with Iran ought to be channelled into support for the opposition.

"I understand the need for immediate vengeance and to inflict pain is something we've all felt at times," Moallemian said.

"But sometimes, it's more important to sit back and reflect on the bigger picture of what may be the impact of any action we might take."

Timeline of events

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

The following is a timeline of key events in the trial of the Iran 13:

January-March 1999 – Thirteen Iranian Jews are arrested in the southern province of Fars.

June 7, 1999 – The Iranian government charges the 13 Iranian Jews with spying for the United States and Israel. Both countries deny the charges, which are punishable by death. Israeli officials worry that the men may have been arrested simply for being Jewish.

Feb. 2, 2000 – The Iranian government releases three of the prisoners on bail, amid announcements that a trial for all 13 is imminent. Advocates for the prisoners worry that the accused will not receive a fair trial, and that a trial is not likely to occur until after Iran's upcoming elections.

March 15, 2000 – It is announced that the remaining 10 prisoners will not be allowed to hire independent attorneys.

April 5, 2000 – After an appeal by Iran's leading rabbi, the Iranian judiciary announces it will allow all 13 Jews to hire their own lawyers.

April 13, 2000 – The trial of the Iran 13 officially opens, but is postponed until May 1, after Passover.

May 1, 2000 – The alleged leader of the Iran 13, Hamid "Dani" Tefileen confesses to spying for Israel on state television. More of the prisoners make "confessions" in the following week. By the end of the month, eight prisoners plead guilty, one admits to some activities but not spying and four plead not guilty, including the three released earlier on bail.

June 13, 2000 – Four of the prisoners retract their "confessions," while a Muslim accused of collaborating with the Jews also denies the charge.

July 1, 2000 – Ten of the Iranian Jews are convicted of spying for Israel and sentenced to prison terms of four to 13 years, drawing condemnation from Israel and U.S. President Bill Clinton. The judge, who also acted as prosecutor, acquits the three other Jews. The defense lawyer vows to appeal.

In this file photo, Itzak Zadmehr, centre, importunes prison officials to let him speak with his accused brother Asher. Asher was sentenced to 13 years in prison.

Canadian census

The year 2001 will see the population of Canada once again responding to census questions. There was some discussion about dropping any questions related to the ethnic or religious background of respondents, but objections from various groups, including Jewish organizations, opposed this trend, because they believed that this information was vital for maintaining meaningful programs for their communities. The government has now agreed that the questions that have been asked in past censuses in this regard will be retained.

Rabbi Gunther Plaut in Toronto

Here is a sampling of some of the questions that we will be asked when the doorbell rings and someone identifies himself/herself as a census-taker or – as may be the case – when we fill out our own census forms.

"Can this person speak English or French well enough to conduct a conversation? What language(s) other than English or French can this person speak well enough to conduct a conversation?"

"What is the language that this person first learned at home in childhood and still understands?"

"To which ethnic or cultural group(s) did this person's ancestors belong?" Among the samples given are Canadian, French, English, Portuguese, Jewish, Greek, Somali, etc.

"Is this person an aboriginal person, i.e. North American Indian, Metis or Inuit? What is this person's religion? Indicate a specific denomination or religion even if this person is not currently a practising member of that group." Mentioned are Roman Catholic, Ukrainian Catholic, United Church, Anglican, Lutheran, Baptist, Greek Orthodox, Jewish, Muslim, Buddhist, Hindu, Sikh, etc.

In the past, minorities were often squeamish about having their identities noted in the census, but the doubts have now largely disappeared, and the positive consequences of knowing the size and nature of a group have great organizational advantages.

Still, lingering questions remain, for the Orwellian image of Big Brother does not seem to go away. I have sympathy for this anxiety, having lived in a totalitarian state for several years. A census conducted in an undemocratic society should frighten all its citizens. But no such worries beset me in Canada.

A well-conducted census generally cannot even be construed to be an intrusion into one's privacy, because the answers do not identify the person who gives them.

The real question is: What uses are actually made of the census results? We know some of the answers, but I think we ought to have a clearer understanding of how the government turns a huge expenditure to the advantage of all our citizens. There are those who believe that a 20-year interval is sufficient. That argument would have cut muster in the past, but our fast-changing times demand more frequent updates.

Barak's sellout or pragmatism?

The recent furore over the bill to exempt haredi yeshiva students from military service places the issue squarely on the legislative agenda for the first time in Israel's history.

First, some history: Israel's secular and religious parties have always coexisted in an uneasy but necessary series of patchwork political compromises. Mapai, Labour's predecessor, and later Likud, made numerous concessions to the haredi and national religious parties in an effort to gain their political support. The Israeli system of coalition government breeds what has become an unsavoury form of political horse-trading.

Shira Herzog in Toronto

The exemption from the draft for haredi students dates back to the early years of the state, when David Ben-Gurion agreed to exempt the then-small number of seminary students. He never considered that the numbers would swell to the thousands that now exercise their right to the exemption.

The situation has two problematic results. By not shouldering the burden of military service that is shared by other Israelis – including many thousands of religious soldiers – the haredi students have removed themselves from a key national consensus. And since they can only exercise the exemption as long as they study and do not work, they and their large families remain on the welfare rolls.

In an effort to appeal to secular and traditional Israelis during the last election campaign, Barak tapped into the simmering resentment over this issue. His promise to level the playing field and to draft the yeshiva students quickly foundered against the realities of Israeli politics and society. A private citizens' challenge led to a Supreme Court ruling that the earlier, ad-hoc arrangements governing the exemption were illegal. The court challenged the government to legislate on the issue within one year.

The Tal Commission, appointed by Barak and chaired by former Supreme Court Justice Moshe Tal, recommended acceptance of the exemption, with an important proviso. At the age of 23, if yeshiva students decided to join the workforce, they would only be obligated to serve an abbreviated term of four months. In this way, the economic burden of support by the state would hopefully be alleviated.

But the timing of the bill was influenced as much by recent political developments as the pressure of the court. Shas, who recently returned to the coalition, pressed for its passage now. And this is precisely why the furore erupted as it did. The vehement and vitriolic reaction of secular Israelis to Shas and its political manipulation in general came to a head over this latest legislative initiative. There has been little room in the heated debate for a sober analysis of the issue.

Ironically, the Supreme Court ruling and the proposed bill are a step forward on this divisive issue. The debate has now moved from the back rooms of political negotiations to the legislative arena, as one of a series of domestic issues that Israelis must negotiate – if not resolve – as they shape their society for the future. It juxtaposes the conflicting visions of life and responsibility against one another in a parliamentary forum.

While the bill provides some progress in its recognition of the economic imperative of thousands of non-productive citizens who will now be challenged to enter the work force, its major weakness is the absence of any limitation on numbers included in the exemption.

The vote pointed to the new shape of Israeli politics in the post-peace era. Much to the chagrin of the religious parties, the Likud voted against the bill, thereby aligning itself with the secular opposition of Meretz and Shinui. And in Barak's own party, numerous MKs would have voted likewise, if not for the party discipline imposed on them. What many political observers have identified as a secular-traditional axis in Israeli politics, that crosses party lines and is the shape of the future, was apparent last week.

Much can happen along the way from first to final reading. The bill that was passed will likely not be the one to return after committee hearings and beyond. But Barak will never be forgiven for being the sponsor of the bill that legitimized the very practice that angers and unites his supporters and the Israeli secular community more than any other.

A new Birthright Jewish studies program

I would like to propose a new Birthright Jewish Studies program, similar in purpose to the exciting Birthright Israel program launched this past year.

Bithright Israel takes thousands of North American Jews aged 18 to 26, who have not been on an organized Israel trip, on an intensive, free, 10-day tour of Israel.

Marion Weinfeld in Montreal

Initial reports of the experience have been very positive, and it has succeeded beyond all expectations.

The basic idea of these trips is to offer a material incentive – a free trip – to help raise Jewish identity. My proposal builds on that basic model.

I suggest the use of material incentives to encourage the same target group of students and young adults to complete Jewish studies courses.

Taking a Jewish studies course is no guarantee of a future Jewish commitment. Nevertheless, the large majority of professors are positive Jewish role models. Most of the students taking these courses have positive Jewish identities.

A typical course is spread out over 13 weeks. Such a course exposes students to the intellectual breadth and depth of the Jewish heritage. It complements the experiential dimension of a trip to Israel. While it can never replace Birthright Israel, there would be synergistic benefits for both.

Apart from the intrinsic benefit of more students taking Jewish studies courses, this idea has advantages from a communal perspective as well. It is inexpensive on a per participant basis. There are almost no start-up costs and indeed no marginal costs. There are no tours to be organized. The university courses are already on the books, the classes are being given, but they are not full.

One option would be to link Birthright Jewish Studies and Birthright Israel directly. The easiest way – and one with no extra cost – would be to set as a condition for taking the trip completing a recognized university Jewish studies course, for those applicants still at school.

Those who have graduated could complete a recognized Jewish adult education course offered by a synagogue or by the local Jewish community.

Most university students have to take elective courses, regardless of their major. Why not Jewish studies?

Charles Bronfman, Michael Steinhardt, and other visionary founders of Birthright Israel have been adamantly opposed to setting any conditions for participation.

There is something inspiring about making this trip available at no cost and with no strings attached, particularly as an effort to reach uncommitted Jews. But apparently 9,000 applicants were turned away while close to 6,000 were selected for the trip.

Setting such a condition might help select those who want the trip most, or might make best use of it. Another possibility is to make this program available to those students not chosen for Birthright Israel.

But there is no need for any link with Birthright Israel, which after all has enjoyed a remarkably successful first year.

Here is a second, stand-alone option. Consider a program that would pay Jewish students a fellowship for taking Jewish studies courses. This is not far-fetched. Many yeshivot and their charitable supporters do precisely that.

Suppose the payment is $300 per course, up to a maximum of two courses per student during their university career. The maximum outlay per student would be $600, less than the estimated $1,800 US cost per Israel trip. That would buy the student 26 weeks of a Jewish intellectual experience.

Such programs could be administered by Hillels and/or federations. This program would give philanthropists interested in Jewish studies another option, apart from the important one of endowing Chairs.

They could also endow fellowship funds to increase the supply of students taking the courses. Assuming there are 50,000 students currently taking Jewish studies courses in North America – that would work out to $15 million per year.

There are various ways to vary the fee schedule, including a kind of lottery if the demand – the additional Jewish studies enrolments – became too high. The details need not be resolved here. The annual cost of Birthright Israel is estimated at $60 million and the benefits flow to fewer students.

The purpose here is to lay out the basic principle. Birthright Jewish Studies is a low-cost insurance policy, which would enhance the impact of the Israel trips. A high-quality trip to Israel, combined with one or two Jewish studies courses, would be a formidable combination for previously marginal Jews.

These courses are like airplanes flying with empty seats. Why not fill them up?

Russian Jews transform a community

Germany's Jewish community is being radically transformed by newcomers from the former Soviet Union. But the immigrants, admitted under a special quota, are struggling with a panoply of problems, notably catastrophic joblessness which consigns them to the purgatory of welfare rolls.

Sheldon Kirshner in Germany

In the past decade, upwards of 113,000 Russians, the vast majority from Moscow, St. Petersburg, Odessa, Kiev and Riga, have settled here. They are drawn primarily by the promise of prosperity and a brighter future for themselves and their children, by cultural and climatic similarities, and by generous social benefits.

Of these, 55,000 are halachically Jews, though less than half of them have Jewish spouses. The remainder are not considered Jewish. However, under Israel's more liberal Law of Return they are Jews, according to Judith Kessler, a Berlin-based specialist on Russian Jews in Germany.

As German officials are fond of saying, Germany is not an immigration country. Nevertheless, seven million foreigners, mainly Turks, live here. Only two groups, ethnic Germans from Eastern Europe and Russian Jews, enjoy seemingly limitless access to, as well as preferential treatment in, Germany.

Judith Kessler

"There are no limits," said Kessler, referring to the number of Russian Jews who will be allowed to settle in Germany in the coming years. By all accounts, an additional 30,000 to 40,000 Russians already have applied for German visas, usually a two-year process.

Germany's open-door policy, a function of the historical debt it owes to Jews after the Holocaust, has dramatically changed the Jewish community in terms of size and national complexion.

Prior to 1990, Germany was home to about 30,000 Jews, most of them Holocaust survivors from Poland, Hungary and Romania, and growth had slowed. Now, thanks to the Russian influx, there are approximately 100,000 Jews, 80,000 of whom are officially registered as such.

This means that 70 percent of registered Jews in Germany today are of recent Russian origin, a figure that would have been inconceivable before the Soviet Union liberalized its immigration policy in the late 1980s.

"Without the Russians, the community would have declined quite a lot," said Michael Brenner, a professor of Jewish history at Ludwig Maximilians University in Munich and the son of a Polish Jewish father. "Without them, there would not have been a future. They enrich the community, though not all of them will stay in it."

Rabbi Walter Rothschild, a native of England who has worked in Berlin since 1998, agrees with Brenner's assessment. "In a way," he observed, "they're the hope of the community."

Russians began streaming into Germany before its reunification in 1990. They regarded Germany as a land of opportunity where anti-Semitism was not a serious problem and where Jews were given a generous head start, said Susan Stern, a Frankfurt writer who settled in Germany 30 years ago.

Over Israel's objections, Heinz Galinski, the late leader of the Central Council of Jews in Germany, encouraged the German government to accept the refugees.

His successor, Ignatz Bubis, who died last summer, walked a fine line. "We do not invite Russian Jews to come to Germany," he explained, "but if they come, we do what we can to help them."

Jewish Agency emissaries in Germany still troll for Russians, but not as aggressively as they once did. Certainly, they have failed to lure back 500 Russians who left Israel during the height of the 1991 Gulf War, when Iraqi Scud missiles were crashing into Israeli cities with terrifying thuds.

Under a 1991 agreement between the federal government and the 16 lander (states), Russian Jews are resettled throughout Germany. The net result is that some 15,000 Russians can now be found in eastern German towns such as Rostock, Dresden, Erfurt, Potsdam, Leipzig and Halle, which had no Jews or hardly any following World War II.

"In some towns," said Kessler, who was born in Gdansk, Poland, and moved to the old German Democratic Republic in 1971, "100 percent of the Jewish population is Russian."

Moishe Waks

Eligible for citizenship after seven years, the Russians receive social and housing assistance, language lessons, job retraining and unemployment benefits. In an effort to acclimatize them to local conditions, Jewish communities provide further help in the form of extra language training and religious socialization.

Paul Spiegel, the current chair of the Central Council of Jews in Germany, has said that the government can do more to assist the newcomers, two-thirds of whom hold university degrees.

Asked to cite deficiencies, Kessler ticked off a litany of woes. German language classes have been cut back to six months from one year. Skills-upgrading classes need to be expanded, given the Russians' 80 percent unemployment rate. Programs for the elderly, who comprise a third of the Russian population, are insufficient.

Relief, however, is not in sight. Chancellor Gerhard Schroeder, a cost cutter, said recently that increased payments to aid in the absorption of new immigrants cannot be expected at a time of fiscal austerity.

For Russians struggling with demoralizing joblessness, this represents a major blow. Kessler, whose task it is to co-ordinate vocational training and language classes for the Russians, empathizes with their plight.

"Many have non-transferable professions and qualifications which do not meet German standards. Most will not find jobs in their field. Very often, they have unrealistic expectations."

A handful, ground down by an inability to adapt and by sheer rejection, have given up and gone back to Russia.

Moishe Waks, vice-president of Berlin's community, said that the Russians have yet to establish themselves economically. Many, too, have difficulty learning German. "And they are far away from Jewish life," he added.

When they arrive, the Russians, having been raised in a secular and atheistic milieu, possess little or no knowledge of Judaism and Jewish culture and history. In some cases, they do not even care to learn.

This problem is all the more acute in smaller, more remote communities that cannot afford to integrate the Russians into the Jewish mainstream.

It might be best if they were consolidated into five or 10 larger communities that could better bolster their identity as Jews, said an official with an American educational foundation in Berlin who prefers to remain anonymous.

Xenia Fuchs

"Russian Jews should be free to live where they want," said Kessler, explaining that they are forced to reside in towns and cities chosen by the government during their first two years of residency in Germany.

Despite the problems which currently depress and weigh them down, the Russians probably have a good shot at establishing themselves in Germany.

"Younger Russians have no difficulty adapting," said Kessler, an opinion shared by Rabbi Rothschild. "The kids of Russians will probably feel more comfortable. They're not carrying the same angst as their parents."

Xenia Fuchs, a 17-year-old student from Moscow who has lived in Berlin for the past nine years, summed it up: "I feel comfortable here."

URGENT APPEAL TO HELP A FELLOW JEW BLINDED FOLLOWING A VICIOUS ATTACK

Mr. Vizel, father of 17 children, was the victim of a vicious, senseless, anti-semitic attack in New York, that left him with severe head injuries and totally blind. As a result of the attack, Mr. Vizel is no longer able to provide for his family who now have the daunting responsibility of caring for their permanently disabled father.

No one should ever know the tragedy and suffering the Vizel family has endured and continues to endure. This once self-sufficient family has been reduced to relying on the generosity of their Jewish brethren for a meagre existence.

We ask everyone to help them in whatever way possible. There can hardly be a greater or more worthy Charitable donation.

Sincerely,
Toronto Rabbis: Amrom Assayag, Yeshua Fuhrer, Yitzchok Kirzner, Moshe M. Lowy, Shlome E. Miller, Duvid Pam, Baruch Taub & Dr. Allan Seidenfeld (campaign chairman) and Moshe Zolty.

Jewish weddings – part 2

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

Last time, I looked at some of the many Jewish wedding resources on the Internet. Today, one of the most beautiful and distinctive features of a Jewish wedding is the chupah or wedding canopy.

First the chupah's origins. We find two biblical references to chupahs: Psalm 19:6 compares the rising sun to a groom's radiance as he exits his chupah [http://www.breslov.com/ref/Psalms19.htm]; and Joel 2:16 exhorts a bride to leave her chupah, and the groom his wedding "room," to ask Divine forgiveness and avert national disaster [http://www.breslov.com/ref/Joel2.htm].

According to the Jewish Wedding site, the chupah, open on all four sides, "is reminiscent of Abraham, our forefather's house which had entrances on all four sides in order to warmly welcome any approaching guests." [http://dcubed.com/ajw /four.html].

In his essay, Huppah: From Eden to Today, Eliezer Segal explains that today's weddings under the chupah harken back to the "paradigm of all weddings: the Revelation of Torah at Mount Sinai. In the biblical account of the marriage between God and the people of Israel our sages also discovered allusions to the presence of a chupah, whether in the enveloping cloud of darkness that hovered over the people, or in the fact that the Israelites, about to enter into their marriage with God, were made to stand 'beneath the mountain' – just as the bride stands beneath the sheltering chupah on her wedding day." [http://www.acs.ucalgary.ca/~elsegal/Shokel/Weddings_Index.html].

Although couples dream for perfection under the chupah, reality often is more difficult. Rabbi Ari Cartun, former Hillel rabbi at Stanford University, looks at those issues in Under the Chupah: Divorced Parents, Non-Jews, and Photographers [http://www.stanford.edu/ group/hillel/Being_Jewish/weddings.html]. Rabbi Cartun suggests that "There are two ways to approach the problem of divorced parents and the chupah: keep everyone out or bring everyone in.

"You can have no one stand under the chupah but the officiant(s), the couple, and maybe the best man and woman... Or, should you want your parents there with you, then add siblings and friends, too. It is good to place siblings between squabbling divorced parents. I do not recommend including divorced parents' new partners under the chupah's fringe unless they are personally meaningful to you, or unless both parents are re-coupled, and they all get along."

There are many online sites where you can view and order your chupah such as e-chuppah [http://www.e-chuppah.com/chuppah_home.htm] and chuppah.com [http://www.chuppah.com]. But Marc Cardinalli and his wife found a more personal approach [http://www.ohr.org.il/ask/ask269.htm#PD]. "We asked our friends to decorate a 1-foot square piece of 100 percent cotton cloth with any memories, thoughts, words, pictures, whatever they thought. My bride-to-be took the squares to a seamstress who put them all together onto an old family heirloom square about 8 foot by 8 foot. We lost my mother last year, but her chupah square remains as a lasting memory of her. We have hung our chupah on our wall so we can see it every day. Someday, perhaps, our children will get married under the family chupah."

Next time, another enduring tradition from the chupah: the ketubah.

History at our doorstep

By RACHAEL TURKIENICZ

During this month, Tammuz, there is a minor fast that occurs on the 17th day. Tradition tells us that on this day the walls of Jerusalem were breached by both Nebuchadnezzar (586 BCE) and Titus (70 CE) marking the beginning of the end of Jewish political sovereignty in Jerusalem.

Three weeks later, the Temple was destroyed. Some Jews believe that since Jerusalem was reunited in 1967, there is no longer a need to fast on the 17th of Tammuz. Yet the Mishnah tells of another event that also occurred on this day.

According to the Mishnah (Ta'anit 4:6), Moses broke the first tablets of the Ten Commandments on the 17th of Tammuz. This act was in response to Israel's sin of worshipping the golden calf.

According to the Torah, Moses was delayed in returning from Mount Sinai and Israel assumed he was dead. At the nation's insistence, Aaron agreed to fashion a golden calf and Israel declared it the Israelite god, worshipping it in pagan fashion.

Seeing the idolatrous activities of Israel, Moses is told to quickly descend because God is planning to destroy all of Israel. Moses convinces God to relent on this decree and thereby saves the nation. According to the midrash, Moses presents a rather daring argument to God.

In the midrash, Rabbi Huna argues that the situation can be likened to a sage who opens a perfume store for his son on the street where the harlots conduct their business. One day the sage catches his son with a prostitute and yells: "'I'll kill him!'" The sage's friend is with him and he rebukes the sage by asking him what he expected. The father is reminded that he chose the perfume business and located the shop amidst the harlots. Why is he then surprised at the outside influence that his son embraced?

Likewise, Moses reminds God that it was God's choice to enslave Israel in Egypt amidst idolaters. Why does God then blame Israel for embracing outside practices and forgetting their own beliefs?

The 17th of Tammuz may seem to be a day forgotten by history. The two events mentioned have very different venues. The political threat to Jerusalem occurs within the land of Israel while the influence of foreign powers occurs outside of the land. The armies of ancient Assyria and Rome seem distant to us, but the controversies over the politics of Jerusalem are still very real.

For the moment, we live in a time with a geographically unified Jerusalem and strong Jewish convictions, but the fate of Jerusalem is not a certainty.

The Israeli government has been saying that it is committed to maintaining Jerusalem intact, come what may. Yet there are those who believe that it is simply a city and should be part of a negotiated settlement. The venue is the land of Israel; the event is the dialogue of history.

The second event of the 17th of Tammuz occurs outside the land of Israel. Today we live in strong Jewish communities among foreign peoples and beliefs, and outside cultures clearly have an effect on us.

The external influence is both positive and negative. Society at large reminds us of our responsibilities to the human community. However, at times it remains a struggle to sort out what is the Jewish way to function secularly.

We need one day a year to remind us that Jerusalem's walls may still be breached. One day a year to remember that outside cultures have strong influences and we could still end up worshipping the golden calf.

Nashira Shabbat: outreach for young adults

By BRAM AARON

A new outreach program is bringing the voices of young Jewish adults together for a unique kind of Shabbat experience.

Since February, on the second Friday evening of every month, Nashira Shabbat has brought together Jews in their 20s and 30s from across the Greater Toronto Area to worship, sing and socialize together.

Guest Voice

Based on similar programs in the United States, Nashira Shabbat was established by Rabbi Yael Splansky, associate rabbi at Holy Blossom Temple, and her planning committee of young people from diverse Jewish backgrounds. The committee recognized a gap in worship opportunities and social programming for young Jews who may have moved out of their parents' homes or finished school, but who don't yet have their own families.

"That leaves those critical years when people can feel detached from the synagogue. Often, there isn't – or people feel there isn't – a lot of outreach during those years, and that's where we come in," Rabbi Splansky says.

"I think young people want something authentically Jewish that lets them express their Jewish identity in both individual and collective ways. I think they already have many good study opportunities, like Kolel in Toronto, but they may lack opportunity to worship with peers in an intimate and non-threatening environment, and that's what we wanted to provide."

Ellen Lefkowitz, 28, is a Nashira Shabbat committee member. An educator at Leo Baeck Day School, she believes prayer and worship are important parts of the Jewish life cycle at any age.

"I wanted a comfortable space to pray, and there are very few places that have attracted young people to pray," she says. "I love being part of a community that worships and celebrates Shabbat together, and it's certainly something I want to continue when I have a family. Nashira Shabbat helps to introduce that tradition to people who aren't comfortable doing it completely on their own."

Lefkowitz says the synagogue can be a place where many young people feel alienated. "Prayer is often associated with bad experiences. Perhaps they only remember what they knew from Hebrew school, which they were forced into by their parents," she says.

"There are a lot of young people out there who want to shape their own Jewish identities, and the opportunity to pray with people who are looking for a similar outlet is very comforting and encouraging."

Kevin Zeilig, 28, is another Nashira Shabbat committee member. "I think there are many young people in the Toronto area who want to get involved in Jewish or synagogue life, but they need some encouragement, and it's much more comfortable to take that journey with others in a similar situation," says Zeilig. "I think sometimes our spirituality isn't quite developed, and this service can help people who have that inkling."

The liberal, egalitarian service is for young Jews from all denominations, even the unaffiliated. Its focus is on participatory singing. "The structure is not that different from a lot of other services," says Zeilig.

During the service, various committee members give relevant readings and Rabbi Splansky explains the importance of the prayers and readings.

"I think a lot of times, in congregations, prayer loses its spirituality and becomes rigid and confining. The rabbi tends to perform the prayers for the congregation," Lefkowitz says. "Rather than the congregation praying for themselves, they're just kind of passively observing. We wanted to get people away from that and get them involved in the service."

In Hebrew, Nashira Shabbat literally means "Let us sing Shabbat," but the committee prefers to interpret it as "bringing our voices together."

"We hope Nashira Shabbat provides something meaningful and relevant for each individual, and helps add to the prayer world voices which are not always heard," Lefkowitz says.

In the fall, Nashira Shabbat will rove to other Toronto-area synagogues, including the Narayever, but "Holy Blossom felt that because of its central location and physical size, it should provide the facility" at first, says Rabbi Splansky.

Nashira Shabbat has so far been well received; average attendance is 60 to 80 people.

"People are really singing. There's great ruach in the room," Rabbi Splansky says.

"The consensus has been very positive," Lefkowitz adds.

It has been so positive that UJA FEDERATION of Greater Toronto has approved funding to allow Nashira Shabbat to continue and enable the committee to expand programming to educational and social events.

The next Nashira Shabbat service is at 7:30 p.m. July 14, at Holy Blossom Temple, 1950 Bathurst St. Future services will be on Aug. 11 and Sept. 15. For more information, call 416-789-3291, ext. 529.

Marty, Avrum make keeping kosher easy

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Marty Galin and Avrum Rosensweig took their passion for food and turned it into a magazine column, a radio and television show and a line of kosher food products.

The pair, who met at a Passover seder 14 years ago, now write a column for the Mississauga-based magazine Hot Toronto, host a Saturday evening radio show on CFRB that attracts about 25,000 listeners, and have their label, Marty and Avrum Eat Here, on a range of food products including pretzels, sorbet, individual cheesecakes and pasta.

They recently met with ONtv to finalize the details for a television show which will have them going out to different functions, looking at the food being served, and coming back to the studio to cook the dish. As well, together with Unico Foods, they are planning a cookbook featuring 12 chefs.

Galin and Rosensweig started up the line of pasta, manufactured by Pasta Quistini, after owner Elena Quistini appeared on their radio show. "We had an instant connection and we decided to do pasta together," says Galin.

Quistini designed the label and created three kinds of pasta-cheese ravioli with sun-dried tomato pesto; vegetable tortellini with black olive pesto and gnocchi with herb and garlic pesto. "We married the sauce and pasta to create a quick – they're ready in about five minutes – easy, kosher [under cor] main dish, and at about $3.99 for two dinners, it's selling at a good price."

She also created three flavours of pizzeli (cracker-like cookies) – tutti frutti, strawberry with chocolate drizzle, and lemon and anise – and is planning to co-package a line of soups.

Galin, a former actor, says the number one rule about their food products is that "we have to like them. If we don't find them tasty, we won't put our names on them. Consumers don't give products a second chance.

"The first time I saw our picture on a product, I felt an enormous responsibility. If our name is there, I want people to be happy. Our products are personality driven, and we are passionate about them. I want people to smile when they see our picture," he says.

Camp Naivelt celebrates its 75th anniversary

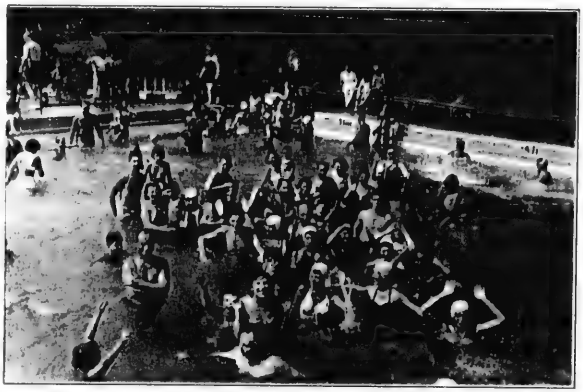
By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — When Camp Naivelt celebrates its 75th anniversary on Aug. 6, it will be a coming together of people whose lives were touched indelibly by the camp, say reunion organizers.

Then known as Kinderland, the camp first began in a cottage as a children's camp run by the Jewish Women's Labour League, a secular Jewish organization, in order to keep their children off the streets during the summer.

Within the first few years, the Labour League took over running the camp, and adults began setting up tents nearby.

In 1936, it bought the present El Dorado site near Brampton. Members of United Jewish People's Order (UJPO) – it emerged from the Labour League – contributed $5 each for a share in the property, borrowing money from their credit union to raise funds for the down payment, and some 90 cottages were built on the site near the children's camp. At its peak in the 1930s,'40s and '50s, Camp Kinderland served over 300 children each summer, adults came to Naivelt for the weekend by the busload, and the dining room served three meals a day.



Some of Camp Naivelt's original campers.

The organization closed the overnight camp in 1962, and a daycamp continued until 1971. But adults have always come to the camp over the summer.

Despite some difficult times, and some decline in population, Naivelt continued, and today there has been a revival, says Maxine Hermolin, executive director, UJPO, whose family has been part of the camp for several generations.

"It is a thriving community of young families who have come to love the connection with a Yiddishkeit with which they can identify," says Hermolin.

David Abramowitz, who has been at camp since he was one year old, said that living there for the summer was a "whole lifestyle. There was a shtetl-like setting. Adults, mostly working people, would pitch tents for the weekends and feel part of the community."

The values and philosophy of the camp – social justice, secularism, Yiddishkeit and a concern for humanity – were taught in a variety of ways, Hermolin says.

"In the beginning, they promoted better working conditions, the formation of trade unions, civil rights and medicare. Now, we fight for the homeless, youth at risk, native Canadians, and anti-racism.

"This is not only formal support. There are people who give their time and hands-on support," she says.

Ester Reiter, an associate professor at York University, says that the reunion is a day of rejoicing, and an opportunity for people to think about what the camp meant to them.

"Most campers came away from camp with a lifelong gut feeling that to be Jewish is to care about issues beyond yourself. That was a constant throughout the generations."

There were stories of fun, she said, but the fun had a unique centre.

Lee Schecter, whose family has been connected with the camp since 1933 when she was a camper, says that "the camp created something that stays in our memories; memories that are deep and wonderful. Both the camp's philosophy and the friendships have endured."

Many of the professionals who have emerged from camp have gone on to work in humanitarian areas, says Rita Bergman who has been at camp since 1935, and whose father built one of the first permanent cottages from a wooden garage. "The philosophy has carried with them into their professional life."

Hermolin said that among the talent that emerged from camp included folksingers The Travellers; Sharon Hampson of Sharon, Lois and Bram; songwriter Eddie Schwartz; and Zal Yanovsky of the Lovin' Spoonful. Pete Seeger and Phil Ochs appeared at camp in concert.

"Camp Naivelt today is a diverse mix of people – artists, social activists, lawyers, teachers, retirees and babies."

The reunion will include a concert featuring The Travellers, songs, sports, stories and a campfire.

This summer, Toronto will be the target of a major missionary crusade. Jews for Jesus has scheduled a two week blitz in August that will employ the media, billboards and a street campaign that will flood our city with conversionary tracts directed toward Jews.

In response to this threat, JEWS FOR JUDAISM is organizing a counter-leafleting campaign to alert and educate the public. We are seeking to train volunteers who will distribute our counter-missionary literature in a non-confrontational manner.

Former Maritime Jews hold picnic in Toronto

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — They may live in Toronto now, but their hearts are in the Maritimes where they were born and lived for many years.

About 50 Jewish Maritimers recently attended a picnic in Earl Bales Park, where they traded memories. A torrential downpour earlier in the day had left pools of water but did not dampen their spirits.

Friendly rivalry between Cape Bretoners and Newfoundlanders enlivened the scene. For example, both Larry Nathanson, volunteer program director at Baycrest Terrace, who is from St. John's, and Dr. Samuel Newman, a periodontist from Sydney, insisted that each one was the host of the picnic.

Newman and Nathanson had worked together to organize the get together.

Nathanson's brother, Danny, was once mayor of New Waterford in Cape Breton, Larry Nathanson said.

In fact, there were 250 Jewish families in the Cape Breton communities of Sydney, Glace Bay and New Waterford in 1935 when coal was being mined five miles out into the Atlantic Ocean, said Dr. Philip Simon, a dentist and former president of the Cape Breton Jewish Club, who has retired and lives in Toronto. Now it is hard to find a minyan in Glace Bay, he added.

Of the five synagogues in that area at that time, only two, one in Glace Bay and one in Sydney, remain, according to Newman.

The large number of Toronto physicians, dentists, engineers and other professionals who are former Maritimers also included Dr. Doug Wilansky, a family practitioner, and Lou Kirsh, originally of Moncton, N.B., an engineer with the federal government in Ottawa for 30 years, who were among the early arrivals at the picnic.

Another guest was Moishe Kantorowitz, a Holocaust survivor from St. John's who was awarded an honorary doctorate by Memorial University there for his Holocaust education work. He arrived in Newfoundland before it became part of Canada on April 1, 1949, a move which led to friendly arguments among the Maritimers. Some still don't think it was a good idea.

"Our parents were immigrants who worked hard to earn a dollar and wanted their children to get a higher education," said Newman. Many Maritimers were descendants of mishpachah from the United States, attracted to the bustling area by relatives who were doing well, he said.

The picnic invitation bore the Gaelic motto, Ciad Mile Failte (A Thousand Welcomes) since so many Maritimers rubbed shoulders with Scottish folk who spoke Gaelic. Many Jews in Cape Breton and other parts of Nova Scotia learned to speak Gaelic to do business when they went from farm to farm.

Not to be outdone, Newfoundlanders have their own welcoming expression: "Long may your big jib draw," according to Robert Reitman, a young Toronto lawyer, who hails from St. John's.

Other guests included Shila and Sholom Auerbach, who had married in Israel before coming to the Maritimes, and their children, Philip, 8, and Danielle, 6.

Gloria Houser of St. John's came with her husband Cyril, a retired Toronto chartered accountant.

Jim and Betty O'Dell of Glace Bay joined their Jewish friends at the picnic, and remember the giant coal mines in that area. Jim said the rivalry between Cape Breton and Nova Scotia was so intense that a whole busload of people entering the connecting causeway was once held up for hours because a Cape Bretoner insisted on being identified as such, and not as a Nova Scotian.

The Bubies and Zaidies have fun with dance group

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to the CJN

TORONTO – You are as old as you feel. And when the performing group of seniors called the Bubies and Zaidies sing and dance, they feel young.

"Some performers tell me that when they feel terrible, when the music starts, they forget their aches and pains," says Fred Field, 79, who organized the group more than 10 years ago and serves as master of ceremonies and director.

"So, when we perform, mostly for seniors, I tell our audience that when they participate, it will make them feel good."

The Bubies and Zaidies, who rehearse weekly, present a one hour musical entertainment program of song, dance and humour, says Field. "It is totally uplifting in nature, and where possible, we involve our audience – and the Bubies and Zaidies enjoy their applause and smiles."

Kitty Cohen performs at the Wagman Centre.

The group performs in the Toronto area—the Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care, Briton House, Pine Villa, Terrace Gardens, Forrest Hill Place, Saranac Senior Residence, Westbury United Church, Lansing Residence, and many others.

Field says that when he retired from his fur business, he wanted to find a way to express himself. He was a drama pupil at the Bathurst Community Centre for five years when he formed Bubies and Zaidies.

With initial funding from a government program called New Horizons, they were able to purchase sound equipment. They are now fully self-sufficient and not affiliated with any organization.

At a recent rehearsal, the troupe of some 15 ranging in age from 65 to almost 90, belted out the joyous music of Aroom Dem Fire, Rozinkes Mit Mandlen, A Little Bit of Mazel, Take Me Out to the Ballgame, When the Saints Come Marching In, as well as other tunes which filled the auditorium of a seniors' residence on Bathurst at Lawrence Avenue.

Tom Weiss works with Field on the arrangements and plays the accompaniment on the piano. Murray Kaye plays the concertina and Bunny Jacobson assists as back-up on the piano. Guest tenor is Ray Evans.

Ben Rosenberg, who has been with the Bubies and Zaidies for two years and serves as the stage manager, told The CJN that he enjoys singing with the group and "I look forward to coming each week – it is a nice sociable group."

Rose Gerry, who also joined two years ago says the group is "like coming for therapy. It lifts me up. And there is so much talent."

She adds that she "loves show biz" and also volunteers with the performing group at the Hospital for Sick Children.

The solo dancers in the group (they also sing) are Kittie Cohen, 87, Marion Green, 80, and Gerry who says about her age, "I am the youngest of the dancers."

Some of the others in the chorus include, Frank Goldblatt, Ruth Bleiwas, Sam Day, Gertrude Sax, Mike Glayt, Frank Harris and Edith Stillman.

Field says that he is the leader because "in a secret meeting, I was voted in as the member with the least amount of talent – so I became the producer and director. I am also responsible for bringing in the cookies for our coffee break at our weekly rehearsals.

"They are a great group of people and I get much satisfaction from working with them," Field adds. "Many of them also do wonderful volunteer work in the community."

As the rehearsal ended, the group belted out the spirited Halleluya. Their vitality and enthusiasm declared that this is exactly the way these bubies and zaidies felt – and they are happy to share their joy with others.

BBYO LEADERS: BBYO recently held elections for the 2000-2001 program year. Seen here is Elaine Raifman, Council N'Siah, and Brandon Kovshoff, Council Godol.

ABOUT PEOPLE

REGIONAL APPOINTMENT

Nancy Chowet of Montreal has been appointed the new Eastern Regional representative of the Canadian Society for the Weizmann Institute of Science. Chowet, a graduate of McGill University with a BA and a major in psychology, also holds a certificate in women's studies from Vanier College. She has been an active member of the Montreal community, has travelled to Israel and has held numerous volunteer positions within the B'nai Brith Youth Organization.

HONORARY DEGREE: York University recently conferred an honorary degree upon Aharon Barak, president of the Supreme Court of Israel. Gerald Sheff and the firm of Gluskin Sheff and Associates hosted a luncheon on behalf of York University's Centre for Jewish Studies to provide an opportunity for invited guests to meet Barak. Pictured above (from left) Marshall Cohen, chair, Board of Governors, York University; Julia Koschitzky, chair, Centre for Jewish Studies, Advisory Committee; Aharon Barak; Gerald Sheff; Michael Brown, director, York's Centre for Jewish Studies.

IN MEMORY: Club Savoy, which evolved from the pre-World War II Jewish Boys Club, disbanded over 55 years ago, yet from time to time former members gather for a reunion. Now, as one or two pass away, "the boys" remember each other in a unique way. In memory of Eddie Cutler, who operated Cutler Forest Products (wholesale lumber) for more than 30 years, they donated a MacIntosh computer for a children's computer area at the Albert and Temmy Latner Jewish Public Library. Eddie's wife Ruth (left) and daughter Jill are seen here at the presentation.

Where are the rallies?

Scene in Ottawa

By G.K. SIMCOE

Given the right circumstances, Jim Peterson can still wax nostalgic about his first encounters with the Jewish community as a Liberal MP. The issue was the community's struggle to bring attention to the plight of Soviet Jews and their bid to immigrate to Israel.

The struggle bore fruit, and a trickle of exit visas turned into a flood. To a large extent, Canada led the fight for Russian Jews and Parliament was no bit player in the drama. A great number of people participated in the fight.

A quarter-century later, most of the same players can be found on the Hill, but somehow, the spirit and determination of the '70s is no longer evident.

If one were to ask Peterson about his involvement back then, he would readily acknowledge the central role played by B'nai Brith Canada and the Canadian Jewish Congress in Canadian efforts.

In contrast, the efforts to draw attention to the plight of a group of Iranian Jews have barely generated a "beep" on the political radar screen.

Lloyd Axworthy made a statement about them in the House, but a scan of Hansard (the transcripts of parliamentary business) reveals no statements from the other four parties. No all-party resolutions, no petitions, no committee hearings, no questioning of the government during question period.

The Montreal Board of Rabbis recently organized a demonstration on Parliament Hill; but there have been no big rallies on the part of the entire community.

Where has the activism disappeared? Both of these organizations have a presence in the nation's capital and one runs across them from time to time on the Hill. Perhaps the strategy is different and there has been a decision to rely on discreet lobbying tactics.

That must be the case. Even an individual like Irwin Cotler, a respected human rights activist who served as counsel to Natan Sharansky and Nelson Mandela and now sits in the House of Commons, has kept a relatively low profile on the matter. His quiet voice is out of character – unless it is deliberate.

Still, a lingering doubt remains. Is it possible that the strategy of quiet diplomacy is a reflection of "the tactics of default"? Have organizations simply run out of steam (or capability) to mount a credible political campaign? One would hope not. But either way, Jim Peterson and his Jewish constituents need to know.

It's deja vu all over again for Saint John senior

By JOEL JACOBSON
Atlantic Correspondent

SAINT JOHN – It was more than a normal Shabbat in Saint John, N.B.

Sixty people filled the pews of Sharrei Zedek Congregation which usually attracted 15 on a good Saturday. But this was different. Harry Holtzman was about to have a bar mitzvah. It wasn't to be a regular bar mitzvah because Harry Holtzman was celebrating his 88th birthday.

When he chanted the haftorah, Metzora, on Shabbat Hagadol, it wasn't the first time or the second the enthusiastic senior had sung it. It's his haftorah almost every year. But on this day, Mr. Holtzman celebrated the 75th anniversary of his bar mitzvah, with the same haftorah in the same shul when he reached 13 years of age in 1925.

"It wasn't supposed to be anything special," he said. "I hadn't really mentioned that it was the 75th anniversary but word leaked out. I usually had the haftorah on that Saturday anyway, but my family made it beautiful."

He said he received more presentations – certificates from the shul, the sisterhood, Hadassah, several trees planted in Israel – than he had on his original bar mitzvah day.

"I was asked to make a speech and I was really overcome. The whole thing really touched me."

It touched others as well. "He told us at his first bar mitzvah, his mother had a party for him that evening – boys only," laughs long-time Saint John resident and Holtzman's niece, Holtzman's niece Marsha Koven. "And Abe Davis was the only one here who was at his first bar mitzvah."

"My father probably does a dozen haftorahs a year," said Holtzman's son Norman, immediate past president of the congregation. "This is something he really wanted to do, something that meant a great deal to him. But he'll probably do a haftorah again next week when he has yarzheit. Physically and mentally, he's at the top of his game. He walks with a cane but still drives his car."

His sister Aida (90) and brother Moe (85) were there, as well as his grandson Jeffrey, his daughter Myra Freeman, who is the newly installed lieutenant-governor of Nova Scotia, and her husband Larry and daughter Debra.

"I was so proud of him that at this stage of life, he has kept tradition," said Freeman. "He told us that he had a great fear of speaking in public at his first bar mitzvah. He said he stopped speaking entirely on that day. When it was his turn, there was a long silence until the rabbi started the haftorah, my Dad chimed in and everything was OK."

She referred to him as a "pillar of the community. He goes to shul every Friday night and Saturday and even belongs to a shul in Florida where he does the same thing."

Ottawa to honour Holocaust survivors

OTTAWA — Prime Minister Jean Chrétien is expected to attend a fall ceremony paying tribute to 55 Holocaust survivors who have made positive contributions to Canada.

The Sept. 27 ceremony, scheduled to take place on Parliament Hill in Ottawa, will be followed by a private reception sponsored by the Speaker of the House of Commons and a gala dinner at the Westin Hotel, to be attended by hundreds of family and friends of the honourees.

The survivors will be presented with specially inscribed certificates.

This is the second time Holocaust survivors will be honoured by the federal government. In 1998, 50 survivors received citations and were feted by Deputy Prime Minister Herb Gray and Secretary of State for Multiculturalism Hedy Fry before 400 family members and well-wishers. The event coincided with the 50th anniversary of the United Nations' Universal Declaration of Human Rights.

Ceremony set for September

This year, sponsoring groups – Canadian Jewish Congress, the Simon Wiesenthal Centre, Jewish Holocaust Survivors of Canada, the Canadian Society for Yad Vashem and B'nai Brith Canada – will team to host the day-long tribute. Defence Minister Art Eggleton and Immigration Minister Elinor Caplan have agreed to be honorary co-patrons.

Organizers chose 55 survivors to dovetail with this year's slogan for the tribute: "55 Years After," referring to the end of World War II.

As well, the survivors will reaffirm their Canadian citizenship oaths in a ceremony to be presided over by citizenship judge and Jewish community activist Sigmund Reiser.

The day will also include formal recognition of the survivors in the House of Commons and a tour of the Parliament buildings.

"We are trying to keep the memory of the Holocaust alive, and to recognize the many accomplishments of survivors," Reiser told The CJN. He said the honourees "don't have to be rich or famous. They could be anyone who rebuilt their lives, raised a family and helped make Canada a better place in any small way."

The deadline for applications is July 31. A survivor may be nominated for the honour by family members or friends.

Applications may be obtained by calling the Canadian Society for Yad Vashem at 416-785-1333.

Verdicts evoke shock, dismay

In a July 5 memo to communal leaders, Canadian Jewish Congress president Moshe Ronen urged ongoing pressure on the Iranian government.

"The government of Iran would like to believe that with the rendering of the verdict and the issuing of the sentences, the Iran 13 case is closed," Ronen said. "It is our responsibility as a Jewish community, working with our governments, to disabuse it of this notion."

An international consortium of human rights lawyers, including one representing CJC, will prepare an appeal to be submitted to Iranian authorities. These authorities, Ronen added, "irrespective of their denials, have shown a definite concern regarding international opinion."

CJC will also be pressing Canada to undertake a number of diplomatic initiatives.

In the meantime, "public events now are very much in order."

Reaction to the verdicts, handed down July 1, was swift.

In a statement issued on Canada Day, Axworthy expressed Ottawa's concerns.

"Canadian concerns about the trial and ensuing sentences stem from the closure of the trials to the public and the fact that the defendants were held without access to lawyers for one year and had only limited contact with their families during their incarceration," Axworthy stated. "In addition, the televised confessions of several of the defendants undermined the stated need for closing the trials and raised questions about the integrity of the judicial process.

"Canada has serious concerns about the manner in which the trials were conducted and the verdicts arrived at. We urge the government of Iran to allow for greater transparency and openness during the appeals process," Axworthy added, noting Canada will continue to monitor events "closely."

CJC flatly said it "rejects all the guilty verdicts. Any convictions and sentences are unacceptable since the accused are innocent of the charges and have been subject to political and arbitrary arrest and imprisonment over the last year and a half."

Congress added: "It is essential as well that no harm befall the Jewish community of Iran. This is a situation that must be closely monitored by the international community and if called for, vigorous action must be taken at any time."

As far as B'nai Brith Canada is concerned, the verdicts amounted to "a crude attack on Orthodox Jewish observance in Iran" and "a warning to all observant Jews in Iran that their religious observance makes them suspect."

Indeed, in his verdict, the judge reportedly noted that all 10 men were guilty of contact with Israel, devotion to the Jewish state and study of Torah. Several of the 10 were religious leaders in the southern city of Shiraz, an observant community. The religious leaders received the harshest sentences.

The Simon Wiesenthal Centre called on Canada to recall its ambassador to Iran for consultations.

Montreal Liberal member of Parliament and McGill University law professor Irwin Cotler, who has observed the proceedings from the start, slammed the "show trial" and convictions as a "travesty of Iranian and international justice…a prosecution and persecution of innocents that violates every canon of a right to a fair trial as guaranteed under the Iranian constitution and international law."

Cotler has documented numerous legal violations which "were of such magnitude that the charges should have been dropped even before the trials began."

Jewish advocacy groups say that protecting Iran's 25,000-member Jewish community must be pursued alongside the campaign for the freedom of the convicted.

As Cotler put it, "it is Iran itself that is on trial. If Iran does not reverse the convictions and release the imprisoned Jews, it will indict the whole Jewish community. Iran will enter the millennium as a pariah of the international community, and it will have only itself to blame." – With files from CJN news services

Iranian Jews said to be living in fear

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The recent Iranian show trial could auger heightened danger for Jews still living in the Islamic republic, according to an Iranian expatriate living in Montreal.

"We have information that they [Iranian Jews] don't live like before," the source stated. "They are afraid of their neighbours. Iran promised that more arrests are coming soon. Everybody thinks [he's] next."

The source of those comments asked that we not reveal his name, while others contacted by The CJN declined to be interviewed. The CJN has learned that Iranian Jews are worried relatives living in the Islamic state will suffer for comments they make in Canada.

According to the Montreal source, who has lived in Canada for 30 years, Iranian Jews are living in fear. "Even on the phone they are very scared to talk about it," he said. "They are afraid someone is listening on the line."

The trial that prompted the latest wave of concern was the result of a power play between Islamic clergy and government forces, the Montreal speaker stated.

Ely Gabay of Toronto, who has no close family remaining in Iran, agreed the alleged spies were innocent victims of Iranian politics. "Iran and the Muslims want to take advantage of this case," he said. "They are using it for propaganda. It was absolutely not a fair trial.

"Their families are very concerned," he continued. "They know better than I do that the situation is not a good one. Iran does not want to kill them. It wants them as a sort of hostage against the United States and Israel, to use them for political benefits."

Gabay, who escaped from Tehran two years after the 1979 Islamic Revolution, said his family employed 345 people in a manufacturing and importing business. They were forced to flee the country with only 10 percent of their assets. "The situation wasn't safe for Jews, especially wealthy families," he said.

As for the estimated 25,000 Jews still living in Iran, "every single minute is a danger.

"The whole situation is a political struggle between two groups, the clergy and the government," the Montreal source stated. "I think this situation [was created by the] Islamic clergy to get an advantage and make them powerful internationally."

Once the Iranian clergy invested so much effort in the cases, they had to convict and impose harsh sentences. "If they made lower sentences, they would lose face before international public opinion," he suggested. "The sentences were set up before. We expected it."

In Los Angeles, home to 35,000 Iranian Jews, anger at the harsh prison sentences far outweighed any sense of relief that the prisoners had been spared the death penalty, according to a JTA report by Tom Tugend.

"My wife has been crying ever since," said Cyrus Javaherian. His wife Nezrim is the sister of Nasser Levi Haim, who was sentenced to 11 years in prison.

"We never expected that Nasser would get such a long sentence," said Javaherian. "He worked for a power company and taught Torah. That's what he did all his life. He only did good."

A 21-year-old student at UCLA who asked that his name be withheld because his parents still live in Iran, grew up in Shiraz. "I knew the 13 who were arrested," he said. "They were my teachers and the friends with whom I played soccer. I know they did nothing wrong."

Western countries should use economic leverage to push Iran to release the prisoners, the Montreal source stated. "It's now or never to intervene for those innocent people."

"People should watch what's going on, become involved and don't forget that the 13 are part of those 25,000 other Jews in Iran who are our brothers," he added.

SAC president, student rep tackle issues at U of T

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Two high school buddies who served on the student council of the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto (CHAT) have graduated to the big leagues of student politics.

Adam Bretholz, a former CHAT student council president, was elected president of the University of Toronto's Students' Administrative Council (SAC) in the spring. In the full-time paid position, the 22-year-old presides over some 33,000 students at three campuses, the largest student organization in the country, he noted, with a larger constituency than that of some towns.

His friend Josh Koziebrocki, 20, who also served on CHAT's student council, was elected to one of only eight student positions (of which only two are filled by full-time undergraduate students) on U of T's Governing Council, the administrative body that runs the university and which receives input from SAC.

Bretholz, a human biology major who has just completed his fourth year at University College, is taking one course this summer and another over the coming academic year. A native of Guelph, Bretholz grew up in Thornhill, but now lives on campus.

As president of SAC, his first priority is the rising cost of tuition, a subject SAC addressed within a more comprehensive presentation at Queen's Park last year. The cost for first-year medical students, Bretholz noted, has risen to $14,000. (Undergraduate arts programs, by comparison, cost $790.20 per course, or $3,951 for a typical five-course load, in addition to $700 in incidental fees.)

Twenty years ago it was "an acknowledged part of our society that we support education and that will better society as a whole," Bretholz said. These days the "whole notion [is] those who can pay will pay and those who can't will get a loan.

"There's either going to be an acknowledgment that part of being Canadian is our social programs, not just health care but education as well – or maybe there'll be a huge amount of apathy and everybody will want to be American. It's not a secret that that's where things are going."

Among his other concerns are student housing, which is scarce and costly in the downtown area; food prices on campus; space for student clubs; the brain drain to the United States; a planned multi-faith prayer facility; and revitalizing the campus bar, The Hangar.

Koziebrocki, a political science major entering his fourth year at New College, shares Bretholz's concerns. He said it's easy to critique if you're sitting back and watching.

"But who are you to judge if you're not trying to implement change for the better yourself?" he asked rhetorically, during an interview in the mid-19th-century SAC building, an early-summer breeze wafting through the open window of the former observatory overlooking King's College Circle.

Among Koziebrocki's other involvements, he was the founding vice-president of the Jewish fraternity AEII at the University of Toronto. Both he and Bretholz are members of the Jewish Students' Union.

War vet gets his BA

TORONTO — From the theatre of war in El Alamein to a lecture hall at the University of Toronto, Michael Kestenbaum has pressed himself to learn.

And at 82, the recent graduate of U of T has no plans of stopping his quest for knowledge any time soon.

"As long as I can see, talk and not cause discomfort to my family, I shall study," says the Haganah and British army war veteran.

Michael Kestenbaum

Kestenbaum was encouraged to learn early on in Beregsas, Czechoslovakia, where his father hired a private tutor to teach him secular and Judaic studies.

When World War II broke out, Kestenbaum's studies were briefly put on hold, but the staunch Zionist continued to pursue an academic track, spending several months as a student at the Hebrew University of Jerusalem in 1941.

As war raged, Kestenbaum understood the importance of gaining British support for a Jewish state, so he joined the Haganah, where he led an entirely Jewish unit in the prestigious British eighth army.

In 1942, as a leader of a platoon, Kestenbaum was sent to El Alamein in Egypt. Quickly learning the secrets of enemy sabotage, Kestenbaum once spotted a mine field, and helped his fellow soldiers avoid catastrophe by telling them to remain in a truck.

Kestenbaum was discharged from the British army in 1946 and continued to defend Israel, first as a soldier in Jerusalem, then as a member of the Israeli army's intelligence unit.

Business opportunities brought him to England, where he worked in the saw mill and knitting machine industry until 1964. He emigrated with his wife, Henrietta and daughters, Naomi and Deborah, to Montreal and then Toronto.

Kestenbaum worked at the clothing company Forsythe until he retired in 1991, but never gave up on his desire to study.

After watching Middle East analyst and Prof. Janice Stein report on the evening news about the Persian Gulf War, Kestenbaum says he "got hooked."

"I phoned her [Stein] and asked if I could audit her lectures. She said, 'Sure, as long as you can find a seat.'"

He managed to find a seat in the crammed lecture hall, and eventually enrolled as a student at U of T at the age of 79.

He says being a senior citizen did not make him feel out of place with younger students.

"I sat at the computer and wrote 15 to 20 page essays just like any other student," he says. "I didn't expect to be treated differently"

With a bachelor of arts in history under his belt, Kestenbaum is eagerly eyeing graduate work.

"I want to acquire more and more knowledge," he says.

Knesset approves military draft bill

By NAOMI SEGAL
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — One of Israeli society's most painful rifts – the religious-secular divide – resurfaced last week as the Knesset gave preliminary approval to a bill on drafting haredi yeshiva students.

The bill would allow the students to be exempt from military service until age 23, when they would decide whether to continue their studies or join the military for a shortened tour of service.

The bill spurred a public outcry from those who demand that the burden of Israel's mandatory military service be equally shared by all.

Prime Minister Ehud Barak

Haredi leaders in turn maintained that Torah study is at least as important to preserving the Jewish state as military service.

Outside the Knesset, some army veterans launched a hunger strike, demanding that the yeshiva students not be given any special dispensations.

Prime Minister Ehud Barak faced conflicting pressures from members of his coalition. Haredi lawmakers supported the bill, while members of his own One Israel bloc lashed out against the bill.

Barak, who only weeks ago emerged from a different coalition crisis with the haredi Shas party, is trying to keep his fragile coalition together in the hope of securing broad backing for a future peace deal with the Palestinians.

In a last appeal following hours of heated Knesset debate, Barak urged left-wing legislators not to let their opposition to the bill jeopardize the "real struggle" – pursuing the peace process.

Barak declared the vote a motion of confidence in his government.

The bill passed 52-43, with seven abstentions. It was sent to parliamentary committee, which will prepare it for second and third votes.

The vote created some strange political alignments. The secular Meretz party, which recently left Barak's coalition to enable Shas to remain, voted no-confidence in the government by opposing the bill.

Opposition leader Ariel Sharon also voted against the bill, a move some commentators suggested might come back to haunt him if and when he tried to reach alliances with the haredi parties.

It was not immediately clear what political costs Barak incurred in the vote and whether the promises he made would offset them.

Before he was elected, Barak had opposed draft exemptions for the students. Last week, when he tried to explain why he had changed his position, he said the bill was the "best compromise" under current circumstances.

The bill was drawn up after a government commission, led by former Supreme Court Justice Zvi Tal, issued proposals regarding the yeshiva students' draft exemptions.

The Tal Commission was formed in the wake of a 1998 ruling by the High Court of Justice that cancelled a decades-old arrangement under which the students are entitled to the exemptions.

The justices said at the time that the arrangement had created a growing sense of inequality in Israeli society.

In 1954, when the agreement was signed, some 400 yeshiva students were granted deferrals.

According to recent estimates, there are now some 30,000 yeshiva students getting deferrals and draft exemptions.

None of the verdicts are final: Iran lawer

CJN News Services

SHIRAZ, Iran — The lawyer representing the 10 Jews who received prison terms July 1 on charges of spying for Israel is confident the sentences will be reduced on appeal.

"None of these verdicts and sentences are final and all can be appealed," said Esmail Naseri. "We are relieved that there were no death sentences…This was a small victory for us. I urge family members of the defendants to remain calm."

But there was little calm when news of the decision of the Revolutionary Court spread in the town of Shiraz, 900 kilometers south of Tehran.

Relatives of the 13 Jews, who arrived at the courthouse in Shiraz on foot because of Shabbat, cried out when the sentences became known. One family member fainted.

Naseri stressed that "this verdict is one big mistake. This is a political [verdict] that is not acceptable to the families or to the lawyers." He added that "neither the verdict nor the convictions are final and each and every one may be appealed."

A foreign ministry spokesman in Tehran said he was satisfied with the verdict.

"Despite a propaganda campaign waged by Israel, the judicial system succeeded to manage the trial in an independent manner and according to the national interests," the spokesman stated.

In Israel, officials protested the verdicts and sentences and denied the accused ever worked for the Jewish state.

> 'Israel will not rest until all the prisoners are released'

"Israel will not rest until all the prisoners are released, said Foreign Ministry spokesman Aviv Shiron."

"The sentences are harsher than we expected. Our community expects the sentences to be much lighter after the appeals process," said Maurice Motamed, the single Jewish representative in the 290-seat Majlis, or parliament.

The case has cast a pall over Iran's Jewish community. It has also attracted international scrutiny, with critics questioning whether the accused could be fairly tried in a process in which there was no jury, in which the judge also acted as prosecutor, and from which observers were banned.

Iranian Jews are allowed to freely practice their religion, but like all Iranians, are forbidden any contact with Israel.

At its height, Iran's Jewish community numbered about 100,000 and was still around 80,000 just before Iran's 1979 Islamic revolution. Now there are about 25,000 Jews, the largest community in the Middle East outside Israel.

For their part, Iranian officials attacked Western criticism of the verdicts, saying it was a violation of its national sovereignty. Some Iranian officials said the verdicts were too soft and might not deter others from spying against the country.

There were also reports the Jews may be punished with fines and lashes – a common penalty for guilt.

No Iranian official was quoted as offering any reassuring words to the rest of the Jewish community.

That only adds to the panic and fear that is said to be pervading the community. Any Iranian Jew who is even outwardly religious may be vulnerable to similar accusations and punishment, according to American Jewish officials.

Since 1979, 17 Iranian Jews accused of spying have been executed, most recently in 1997 and 1998. The difference now, say American Jewish advocates for the Iran 13, is that the earlier arrests were virtually kept secret.

There are chilling similarities, however. Then, as now, the charges were trumped up, with the Jews used as pawns in the political battles within the Iranian leadership.

China helps Iran, Syria develop long-range missiles

By ZE'EV SCHIFF
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — China is aiding Iran and Syria in projects to develop more advanced surface-to-surface ballistic missiles, according to U.S. sources.

The Americans add that notwithstanding Washington's and Israel's protests to China, Beijing is helping the two Middle East countries set up a factory to make missile engines, guidance systems and solid fuels.

Israeli sources confirmed that on several occasions, including the recent visit to Israel by Chinese President Jiang Zemin, Jerusalem has asked China to refrain from assisting those countries in missile development.

Chinese support for the missile projects is mainly being implemented in Iran in ways that experts consider critical to the development of long-range missiles: that is, selling Iran materials for the development of solid rocket fuels, the setting up of a factory for making the NP 110 missile engine, and the transfer of missile-guidance technologies.

The guidance systems are meant both for long-range ballistic missiles and shorter-range Scuds, already available in Middle Eastern arsenals, and include sensors that are generally used on satellites.

China built a missile range with all the necessary telemetry equipment for long-range ballistic missiles in Iran. China built a supersonic wind-tunnel in Libya to help the North African country test its missiles.

China's missile-technology transfers to Syria and Iran were mentioned by the United States in talks with Israel over the sale of the Phalcon spy plane to China, over which Washington and Jerusalem have repeatedly disagreed.

The Americans have argued that, on the one hand, Israel is willing to ignore the military aid China provides to Iran and Syria in exchange for Chinese cash. Yet, on the other hand, Israel demands that Washington act forcefully to block Russian missile deals with Iran, but does not hold Beijing to the same standard. American sources say they see this as a puzzling contradiction in Israeli policy.

The unofficial Israeli response has been that while Israel knows about Chinese activities in Iran and Syria, it still hopes to influence Beijing diplomatically in its favour. In the past, Israel has believed it has sufficient influence to block the Chinese sale of M9 surface-to-surface missiles to Syria.

In any case, it is clear that Israel has not succeeded thus far in stopping Chinese sales. China though, remains within the parameters of international norms by selling only parts of systems and not the complete missile systems.

China does agree not to sell Iran or other countries technologies that will assist them in developing nuclear weapons.

Panel to investigate OU handling of complaints

NEW YORK — The longtime leader of Hillel: The Foundation for Jewish Campus Life, Richard Joel, is heading an independent panel to investigate how the Orthodox Union (OU) has handled sexual harassment complaints.

Individuals interested in contacting the panel headed by Joel can call 1-877-905-9576 or e-mail inquiryncsy@yahoo.com.

Rabbi Baruch Lanner resigned from the OU after the New York Jewish Week published an article in which numerous people said Rabbi Lanner had harassed or molested them when they were teens.

The Week in Israel

July 3

• The trial of an Israeli agent allegedly involved in a bungled Mossad operation in February 1998 opened in Switzerland.

• Israel and India agreed to form a joint commission to combat terrorism.

July 4

• A parliamentary committee voted unanimously to lift the immunity of former cabinet minister Yitzhak Mordechai so that sexual harassment charges may proceed against him.

July 5

• Vandals attacked the Reform movement's Hebrew Union College in Jerusalem. Several glass windows were smashed and the word "Satan" spray-painted near the building.

July 6

• Prime Minister Ehud Barak said he told French and British leaders during his visit to them this week that Israel would take "unilateral steps" of its own if Yasser Arafat declares an independent Palestinian state without a peace deal.

• Barak urged some parties not to rush to pull out of the government because of the impending summit at Camp David. The parties are opposed to the concessions they expect Barak will make to the Palestinians under the pressure of the situation.

July 7

• The Yesha Council of Jewish Settlements and other right-wing organizations began preparing widespread protest activities, including hunger strikes, ahead of the Camp David Summit scheduled to begin next Tuesday.

• President Ezer Weizman was expected to submit his resignation on Monday.

With an eclectic mix of Alanis Morissette, Barenaked Ladies and French Canadian music playing in the background, about 300 people congregated on the sprawling front lawn of the Canadian ambassador's residence in Savyon for Canada Day.

With Canadian flags everywhere, it was hard to remember this party was taking place in Israel. There was Canadian lox, Canadian cheddar, Canadian wines and beer, Canadian maple candies – and Canadians everywhere.

The annual event attracted dignitaries including Ambassador Michael and Mrs. Linda Bell, Members of the National Assembly, MP Irwin Cotler, UN peacekeepers, and Members of the Knesset.

Also in attendance were expatriates who have made aliyah. Michael Bell made a toast to Canada and to Israel's and Canada's continued friendship.

"Happy Canada Day and l'chaim," he said.

Both country's anthems were sung, with O Canada being sung in French and English.

"It's a wonderful experience," said Quebec MNA Michel Moreyn. "After years of teaching [about Israel's history], it's a different experience seeing it." Moreyn, a history teacher, was in Israel for his first time.

Roslyn Schneidman, executive vice-president of Emunah Women of Canada, said she was thrilled to be at the party. "It's a great way to celebrate Canada Day," she said.

The party was held on June 29, two days before Canada's 133 birthday.

Promoting peace through advocacy

By VIVA PRESS
CJN Israel Bureau

JERUSALEM — Participants in this year's McGill Middle East Program in Civil Society and Peace Building (MMEP) recently met in Israel for training.

The fellows – four Israelis, four Palestinians, four Jordanians – will arrive in Montreal at the beginning of August to take part in the program.

Rad Hadid, 27, is one of this year's Jordanians participating in MMEP which promotes peace through community advocacy.

"I hope to get experience about the Canadian social welfare system," said Hadid, who has been working as a project co-ordinator in Jordan's Red Crescent Society in Amman. "I'm hoping to adjust it to Jordan."

Similarly, Miri Segel, one of the Israelis taking part in MMEP this year, hopes to get new ideas in how to implement community awareness.

"I really believe in citizens' empowerment and the connection between social justice and peace," said the 44-year-old, who works for Community Advocacy in Jerusalem's Katamonim neighbourhood.

"MMEP is a remarkable opportunity to see different ways people are doing things, to get new ideas, to get more tools that I can bring back with me to Community Advocacy."

Participants of MMEP study at McGill University for one year and then work in communities back in their homelands for the second year.

MMEP targets professionals including social workers, lawyers, doctors and business people who are interested in working in community-based services.

"We are bringing people together and focusing on their similarities rather than their differences," Nicky Aumond, MMEP's project manager, said in a telephone interview from Montreal.

Professor of social work at McGill, Jim Torczyner created MMEP for Israelis, Jordanians, and Palestinians because, as he says, he is "a peace builder."

Torczyner, who believes everyone deserves an equal opportunity, started the MMEP so that he could teach others how to get involved and win their fight for equal rights. He believes that without equality, peace is unattainable.

Amal Asana, 28, agrees that equality and peace are the answers to the conflict in the Middle East. Asana was one of MMEP's first students. She is now the co-ordinator of social rights for Bedouins in the Negev.

Asana works in getting equal rights for women and children, and getting people and their villages recognized by the state.

"If people are living in poverty and very bad conditions they will only see their suffering and see everything from their eyes as poor people. When people get their rights and feel better they'll see things better," Asana said. "We have to work more in bringing people together and have them work on similar things and people will start to feel differently towards one another."

"People have to feel recognized," said Salah Al-Louzi, director of the Practice Centre in the Eastern Neighbourhood of Sweileh City in Amman. Al-Louzi studied at MMEP two years ago and is now working in Jordan trying to put his studies into action. He came to Israel to see how Asana's community work is going.

"We are forging a new culture of understanding and tolerance predicated on the principle that all people share the same rights," said Torczyner who has been in Israel for the past month.

The community advocacy centres now set up in Amman, Nablus, Beersheva, and Jerusalem by MMEP graduates have all been influenced by Project Genesis – a community outreach program based on citizen empowerment set up by Torczyner in 1975.

Jacques Bensimon quits TFO and heads to Banff

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The For Sale sign outside Jacques Bensimon's modest detached house in a quiet mid-town neighbourhood signifies change. Yet another chapter in his career has run its course.

Last month, he stepped down as managing director of TFO, the French-language service of TVOntario, and announced that he was going to Canmore, Alta., to be executive vice-president of the Banff Television Festival.

The 21-year-old annual one-week festival takes place in June and attracts the leading lights of the industry. "It's a world event," said Bensimon, who assumes his new job on Oct. 1.

Bensimon left TFO, which caters to Ontario's 500,000 francophones, following a philosophical difference with its new president, Isabel Bassett, a former provincial cabinet minister who lost her seat in the last election.

"I began to notice a political agenda, and Bassett was the embodiment of it," he explained. "I started saying to myself, 'It's time to move on. This place is being transformed into something else.'"

Bensimon joined TVOntario in 1986 when French programming was broadcast only on Sundays. He transformed TFO into a strong public institution which reflected Ontario's francophone reality.

Broadening its perspective and its reach by creating new and original programs, he franchised its signal to cable TV companies in Quebec and New Brunswick, sold its cassettes to TV stations across western Canada, and entered into co-production agreements with countries in Europe, Africa and Asia (including Israel).

Jacques Bensimon

"We made the francophones of Ontario visible on the map," said Bensimon, a Moroccan Jew who was an editor and a director at the Montreal-based National Film Board of Canada from 1967 to 1986.

Widely considered to be the father of TFO, he assiduously honed its mandate, establishing a balance between what he describes as "formal and informal education."

Peter Herrndorf, Bassett's predecessor, said that Bensimon fashioned TFO into "a combination of the cerebral and the populist."

By Bensimon's estimation, his Jewish sensibility helped enormously, sensitizing him to the perspectives and needs of his French minority audience.

Born in Agadir 55 years ago, Bensimon is from a middle-class family which left Morocco in 1958. Like many Moroccan Jews shaped and influenced by the long French colonial presence, the Bensimons panicked when Morocco regained its independence in the mid-1950s.

In common with thousands of Moroccan Jews, they immigrated to Quebec, thinking that they would feel at home in French.

Emile, his late father, was a tailor and then a builder of hotels and villas who had commercial interests in France. In Montreal, however, he lost his magic touch and was forced to turn to tailoring to make ends meet.

His mother, Fiby, who still lives in Montreal, along with her three daughters, Marguerite, Therese and Georgette, was more successful. She ran a shoe business, and as Bensimon fondly recalls, kept the family together.

Bensimon, whose wife Vera is also of Moroccan origin, decided to become a filmmaker after watching Francois Truffault's movie, The 400 Blows.

Graduating from Montreal High School, he studied at Sir George Williams University before switching to City College and New York University, where he majored in film.

There, he started a biographical documentary titled Once Agadir, which he finished after being hired by the National Film Board of Canada.

Bensimon was involved in the production of more than 30 documentaries. Among them were Twenty Years Later, which turns on Sephardi immigration to Quebec, and Moroccan Diaries, a trilogy concerning his past, Jewish identity and the contributions of Jews to Moroccan society.

In filming Moroccan Diaries, Bensimon was granted an interview with King Hassan, who died last year. "His dream was to rebuild the Jewish infrastructure eroded by the emigration of the Jews," he said.

Bensimon, who has been back to Morocco about a dozen times since his family's departure, is optimistic about the future of its dwindling Jewish community.

A member of Toronto's Temple Emanuel and the self-help Sephardic Network, he is chary of the separatist movement in Quebec, home to about 25,000 Moroccan Jews. While he respects Quebecois culture and hopes it will prosper, he is wary of nationalism which, he believes, "always excludes someone else."

On the other hand, he feels that "Canada couldn't be Canada" without francophones."

He and his wife, who have two boys (Jonathan, 20, and David, 17), look forward to their new lives in Alberta.

"Is there a synagogue in Canmore?" he asked a reporter. Probably not. But Calgary, with a substantial Jewish community, is only an hour away by car.

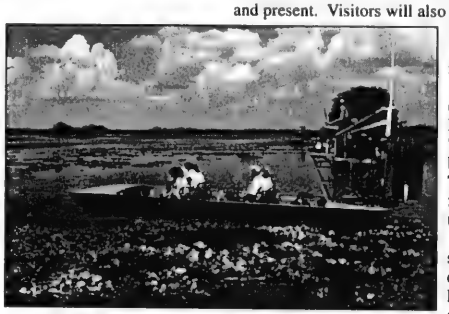
Fort Lauderdale is not just a place to hibernate in winter

By KATHRYN KATES
Special to The CJN

FORT LAUDERDALE — Fort Lauderdale isn't just a place for bubbies and zaydes to go in the winter. The greater Fort Lauderdale area on the East Coast of sunny Florida offers a plethora of activities for the entire family, all year round.

Of course, the first thing to do in Fort Lauderdale is check out the 37 kilometres of sandy beaches. They include Hollywood, Dania Beach, Fort Lauderdale Beach, Pompano Beach and Deerfield Beach.



Alligators await in the Everglades.

The Clean Beaches Council has designated all of them as Blue Wave Beaches, which means they are clean, safe and user friendly.

With many canals, Fort Lauderdale boasts of being the Venice of America. The best way to see the sights along these intricate inland waterway passages is to hop aboard a taxi boat. Passengers are allowed to embark and disembark at their leisure at one of 20 stops at shoreline hotels and attractions. An all-day pass for the Water Taxi of Fort Lauderdale costs $16 (US), children are half price, and free on Sunday when accompanied by an adult.

For kids 5 to 12 years old, there is a unique Ocean Adventure Camp called The Funky Fish Kids Day. At a cost of $45 for the first child, $35 each additional child. The program, approved by the Broward/West Palm Beach County School Board, offers five hours of fun activities including snorkeling lessons in the pool and the shallow ocean, T-shirt tie dying, games and a graduation ceremony.

The program is available at 10 hotels and resorts and open to all Fort Lauderdale visitors by calling 954-561-4499.

If you've never met an alligator up close and personal, you can at the Sawgrass Recreation Park.

Although you can't script the emergence of alligators from the waters of the Everglades, the airboat tour operators are pretty adept at coaxing a few out with morsels of food. Adjacent to the ride is a Seminole Indian Village and a small sanctuary housing alligators, exotic snakes, turtles, monkeys and a very cute Florida Panther – and I don't mean Pavel Bure.

Just 10 minutes away from the park is Sawgrass Mills, an outlet mall featuring over 300 retail stores, name brand discounters, eateries and entertainment venues. While mom and dad search for bargains, kids can spend hours at Gameworks, a high-tech arcade with all the latest video challenges.

More great shopping and tourist hot spots can be found on trendy Los Olas Boulevard, the Los Olas Riverfront and Beach Place on A1A. Expect crowds at all hours of the day and night.

After serious shopping, you can relax amongst nature with a 25-minute tram ride through Flamingo Gardens' native and exotic flora. There is a birds of prey exhibit and a wildlife encounter show daily.

Although the folks in Fort Lauderdale will never admit to it, there are a "few" rainy days in this tropical vacationland. When weather does turn foul, there are a number of wonderful exhibits to occupy your day. Attractions of note include the Museum of Discovery & Science with its Blockbuster IMAX 3-D Theatre on a five-story screen. Don't miss the IGFA Fishing Hall of Fame and Museum with interactive games and virtual fishing, even fun for those of us whose idea of a good catch is already cooked and on the table.

Next door to the IGFA is the Outdoor World Bass Pro Shops, a mega-sporting goods store featuring a 136,000-litre indoor aquarium and archery and rifle ranges.

The Graves Museum of Archaeology and Natural History showcases artifacts from cultures around the world both past and present. Visitors will also encounter life-like dinosaurs including bambiraptor feinbergi, the most complete raptor ever found.

Bambi is named in honour of Florida philanthropist Michael Fineberg who "adopted" her and financed her preparation and mounting. This juvenile raptor stands free, unlike other specimens that are locked in stone.

In the evening you can stroll the beach strip where the clubs are hopping till dawn. For those who prefer a more quiet evening – horse drawn carriage rides are available down the most fashionable boulevards in town.

The performing arts are very much alive at a number of theatres, including two at the Broward Centre For The Performing Arts. During hockey season, fans can check out more Florida Panthers in their natural habitat at the National Car Rental Centre.

For more information contact the Greater Fort Lauderdale Convention & Visitors Bureau at 954-765-4466 or at www.sunny.org.

THE SOUND OF NO HANDS CLAPPING

Judge Barrington Black, a playgoer in London, England, recently faced a dilemma after watching David Edgar's play Speer, directed by Trevor Nunn at the National Theatre Company. The play covers a 50-year span, and features Alex Jennings as the Nazi architect Albert Speer, and Roger Allam as Hitler.

Black felt that Allam, who depicted Hitler's character "ranging from a strutting despot to a hunched madman," gave a particularly fine performance. However, he began to feel uneasy as the 3½ hour play was coming to an end.

"The cast deserved applause, but what if Allam took a curtain call on his own?" Black asked in a letter to the London Jewish Chronicle. "Could I bring myself to applaud a man dressed as Hitler, despite an outstanding performance?

"Alas, when the time came, he did appear alone, the audience thundered appreciation, but my hands made their own decision. They remained still."

Despite appearances, Black is certainly not alone. Many – especially those with first-hand memories and their children – have already voted with their feet and kept away from the theatre.

Others in attendance may have also felt a similar hesitancy to applaud the actor's "outstanding performance" in the persona of Hitler, but remained sensible enough not to make the classic mistake of "shooting the messenger" because of the message he bears.

Even a century from now, Jews and others will likely still be gripped by a similar dilemma when the Nazi dictator is represented on stage, no matter how excellently.

The Nazi Fuhrer had desired to establish a 1,000-year Reich, but instead he cursed and besmirched his own name and that of his regime for millennia.

After all, do we not still razz, castigate and denounce the name of Haman at Purim, much as playgoers would hiss the villains of old-fashioned theatrical melodramas?

Gebirtig Remembered: The Toronto Yiddish poet Simcha Simchovitch has completed an English translation of the poems and songs of the great Yiddish folk poet and composer Mordecai Gebirtig, murdered by the Germans in Krakow, Poland, in 1942.

The 150-page manuscript, including the translator's introduction, was edited by Canadian poet Raymond Souster. Its publication by the Mosaic Press of Oakville is imminent.

A small committee under the chair of John H. Pollock, QC was formed to help in the publication and promotion of the work.

Blake Celebrated: As it embarks on its 25th season, the Inner Stage Theatre Company presents Sweet Smiles, an interactive theatre experience for children.

The performance combines William Blake's poetry (Songs of Innocence), dance, music, masks and audience participation. Leah Posluns Theatre, 4588 Bathurst Street. Adults $8. July 13, 2000, 10:30 a.m.

First Book of Poems: "I want to write poems that deal with Jewish subjects from the inside – not as an alienated witness, but as a participant," says Adam Sol, a poet whose first collection of poetry, Jonah's Promise is due for publication in August.

The American-born and -educated Sol, who also writes literary and music criticism, lives with his wife, Rabbi Yael Splansky, in Toronto.

Pop lyricist overcomes illness

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

Karon Bernstein

TORONTO — Though in great pain a lot of the time, Karon Bernstein has overcome her arthritis to pen the lyrics and be executive producer of the hot album If I Could and of a soon-to-be released single Let's Go.

"I've always dreamed of being a writer of hit pop lyrics, and I wouldn't let anything interfere, even though I was trained as a classical pianist," she told the CJN.

Bernstein, 25, has had juvenile arthritis since she was six, making walking difficult and dancing out of the question.

Her inspiration is pop artist Lorraine Lawson, who sings the lyrics of If I Could and will perform on July 12, at the Capitol Event Theatre, 2492 Yonge St.

"Lorraine is a terrific person and was my vocal teacher for two years," Karon said. Lawson and Greg Kavanagh are the co-producers of If I Could.

To cope with her arthritis, Karon maintains a rigorous 2½ hour daily exercise routine, which includes riding a stationary bicycle and swimming in an indoor pool at her Castlefield home.

She had a double hip replacement in April and August of last year to offset the bone damage caused by her arthritis.

"For those my age, this kind of operation is uncommon as it's usually done on older people whose bones have deteriorated,"she said, adding that the titanium prostheses have helped her.

Despite two months spent recovering at St. John's Convalescent Hospital, Karon said she was able to cope because of the love and support provided by her older brother David, 28.

She also continued to write lyrics, allowing her heart to take her to places her body could not go.

Primadonna a dig at opera

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — "I was bitten by the theatre bug at age 11 when I played the part of a bar mitzvah boy in a Shalom Aleichem play at the Winnipeg YMHA and from then on theatre has been my life," says Tom Diamond.

A director in the United States and Canada, Diamond, 43, is at the helm of a month-long production of Primadonna, the First Farewell Tour, which opened July 4 and runs until Aug. 5, at the Canadian Stage Theatre.

The star of the one-woman show is soprano Mary Lou Fallis. "She is a joy to work with," Diamond says.

As the title implies, the show is a sly dig at opera singers, and Fallis, he says, has been described as "probably the funniest soprano in the world."

Diamond spends half his time in Canada and half in the United States and other countries. "It doesn't matter whether an actor is from Toronto or Timbuctoo, if the talent is there," he says.

He is delighted to work on this comedy, which he says is "completely different" from the version that played last year at the same venue for a month.

Diamond gained international recognition when he directed Squonk, a zany performance art play, which he said was held together with "chewing gum and baling wire."

Squonk was highly praised by New York senior drama critic Ben Brantley and became the first musical to play off-Broadway in 2,000. "I got a call from a person asking me to rescue this play and the first work I did on it was in Toronto. Some day I hope it will play in Canada," Diamond says.

'Crusty, tough-minded' judge shows different side to himself

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

David Vanek, a retired provincial criminal court judge, has produced a highly readable volume of memoirs that illuminates his family's early history in the Toronto area, numerous historical matters pertaining to the local Jewish community, and his 21-year career on the Ontario bench.

Fulfilment: Memoirs of a Criminal Court Judge (Dundurn Press, $25.99) shows the warm human side of the man whom the Toronto Star once described as "a crusty, tough-minded, fiercely independent provincial court judge."

The book indicts Vanek as a fair-minded, rational, and frequently funny man who does not shrink from admitting his faults. Although his courtroom demeanour did not hint at it, the judge is a talented raconteur.

Vanek was born in a hamlet near Newmarket in 1915. His parents ran a tiny resort called Cedarholm Park at Lake Wilcox, just north of Toronto, which offered a bandstand, cottages and a refreshment stand specifically for Jews, who were then excluded from neighbouring establishments.

At the University of Toronto, where he studied law, he joined the first Jewish fraternity and met Lou Weingarten and Frank Shuster, who would become the famous comedy team of Wayne and Shuster.

Later, as a soldier in wartime England, he encountered them unexpectedly during one of their performances for the troops. To the great surprise and hilarity of all three, he stepped forward just as they called for a volunteer for a magic trick. "What perfect timing!" he writes. "Ascending the stage was virtually involuntary. I could not possibly have resisted the temptation."

Another memorable moment occurs as Vanek, stationed in an English town at war's end, makes an unauthorized visit to London as the victory over Japan is announced.

"I was one of the huge throng that lined Whitehall to witness the procession of royalty for the opening of Parliament that day. I was also amongst the huge gathering of people, joyous and tearful, celebrating VJ Day at Trafalgar Square and Piccadilly Circle. Finally, I was crammed within the immense gathering in front of the palace wildly cheering the royal family as the King, Queen and princesses appeared on the balcony and waved to their subjects and well-wishers."

After an admittedly indifferent career as a soldier, Vanek led a distinguished career as a lawyer and judge, and became involved in numerous public causes. As he relates, he once ran for office as a Conservative MPP at Queen's Park. He also helped to found the Credit Counselling Service of Toronto as well as an influential midtown ratepayers' association.

Without question, Vanek is best known for his handling of the sensational Nelles case, in which a nurse was charged with murdering four infants at Toronto's Hospital for Sick Children. In Fulfilment, he offers an illuminating chapter describing the preliminary inquiry he conducted and his eventual ruling that insufficient evidence existed to bring Susan Nelles to trial.

He made that decision knowing that another 20 babies had also died at the hospital under highly suspicious circumstances. "In the end," he writes, "how twenty-four babies, who were not expected to die, came to their death ... remains a mystery."

In Fulfilment, Vanek combines personal family history, social history and legal history into a highly fulfilling read.

Furrier describes life in Ghetto

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to the CJN

Jack Klajman, a 69-year-old furrier in London, Ont., has written Out of the Ghetto, a book that describes how he survived the Holocaust as a boy.

The 154-page softcover book was published recently by Vallentine Mitchell, a British publishing house, and should soon be available at bookstores in Canada.

Out of the Ghetto details Klajman's experiences as a child in the Warsaw Ghetto. Creeping through holes in the wall to get to the Christian part of the city, he posed as a Christian child and begged for food, which he smuggled back to his family.

In one incident, he met a machine-gun-toting German major nicknamed Frankenstein just as he was returning to the ghetto with a bag full of smuggled goods.

Knowing Frankenstein's penchant for shooting Jewish children, the boy begged for mercy, speaking in Polish and showing off the crucifix around his neck to persuade the man that he was a Catholic trying to make some money for his parents. Miraculously, the ruse worked.

After he had fled to the safety of a nearby building, witnesses of the encounter surrounded him, amazed that he was still alive. "My boy, you have just been reborn," one of them said. "You have just escaped the devil himself. If he did not take your life, it means God is good to you. He wants you to live. You are going to survive the war.... If you can make it past him, you can make it past anyone."

Klajman called it "the scariest moment I ever had crossing the wall" and said he was traumatized for days afterward.

He fled the annihilation of the ghetto by hiding among dead bodies, and later fleeing through the sewers. He survived by posing as a Christian child and eluding authorities as much as possible. He lost his entire family and about 100 relatives.

"It's a story I started to write 40 years ago," said Klajman recently in a telephone interview. "I started to write a few pages and I got nightmares, so I threw it away.

"I had a customer who was a psychiatrist and he said, 'Jack, you write it and it'll be the best therapy for you. You might get nightmares again, but it'll be worth it.'"

Klajman said the book took him six days to write. "The things that happened, you can never forget. It's all locked in your head, anyway. A story like this stays with you for life."

A son, Ed, a journalist, helped prepare the manuscript for publication.

Klajman reached Toronto in January 1948, when he was 16. Because his father had been a furrier in Warsaw, he apprenticed in the fur business in London, Ont., at a starting salary of $10 a week. He opened his own store within five years.

He married Sonia 41 years ago. They have three sons and a daughter. "I wrote it for the kids, and for my grandchildren," he said. "I wasn't thinking of publishing it in the beginning. But my son (Ed) said, 'You have to publish it.' So he took care of it.

"I sent a copy of the book to Oprah (Winfrey) a couple of weeks ago," he said. "It may take a couple of months before I hear anything. If Oprah's staff really like it and Oprah gets to read it ... it's got to catch on in the States."

Klajman still works as a furrier, although he is semi-retired. His store, Klyman Furs, is located in London, Ont.

Parenting a disabled child is a loving challenge

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Celebrating a child's tenth birthday is a milestone in any parent's life. To Miriam Edelson, it is almost a miracle.

Ten years ago, Edelson's son Jake was born with a rare disorder – his brain stopped developing between 12 and 14 weeks after conception. She was told that children with this disorder, lissencephaly, are unable to sit up, walk or speak, and that most don't live past a couple of years.

In her recently published book, My Journey with Jake, A Memoir of Parenting and Disability (Between the Lines), Edelson talks about the months before Jake's diagnosis, and the emotional roller-coaster ride she has experienced throughout his life.

Edelson, who has kept journals since Jake's birth, says she wrote the book because "we do not hear very much about medically fragile children. Unless a tragedy happens, these kids are invisible.

"Their care is not mandated by legislation, and the courts do not get involved unless the child is abused or neglected. These are the kids that suffer when there are budget cuts."

Few palliative care facilities exist for infants, she says. "Bloorview MacMillan Centre has five palliative care beds, but that is five beds for an entire city.

"It is very difficult for people to think about infants not surviving. They just don't like to go there. I wonder if that gets in the way of getting them the care they need."

Even if a suitable home care program is found, she says, they are highly vulnerable to government spending cuts, and continuity of staffing is unlikely.

Edelson and her ex-husband Jim, Jake's father, began searching for a home for Jake after realizing they could not provide him with the kind of 24-hour care he needed.

Their search culminated in a referral to Gail Bench-Grant, who runs a home – Susie's Place – near Belleville. "I liked her immediately, even over the telephone. It was obvious that she was experienced and knowledgeable, and that she had respect for the parents."

Edelson credits Bench-Grant for keeping Jake alive. "I believe he has lived this long because of the tremendous care and love he is getting. There should be many more places like this."

Death, however, "is always present in the universe…It sometimes dangles very close, only to be put temporarily on hold...Perhaps that is why our story is so much like one of a relationship between new lovers: All senses are heightened and one cherishes every single breath together," Edelson writes.

At home with her younger daughter Emma, Edelson says Jake's presence is always missed. "At the community seder we wished he were there, but we've learned to make peace with the situation. We have to make the best of it.

"With Jake, I learned to love fully. Early on, I let myself love him 100 miles per hour… I want it documented that it is possible to love little ones like this."

There are moments when she wonders how much she should tell her daughter about Jake's condition, "but the truth is the best. That will help her to know her brother, and to let him enrich her life."

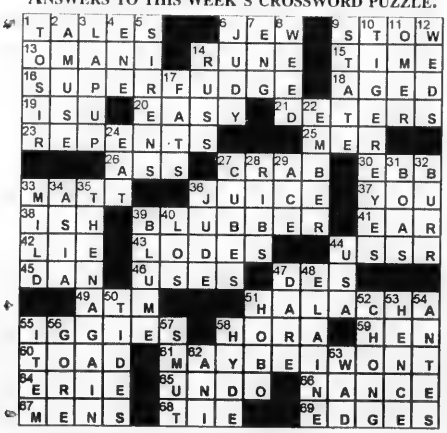
Jake can't say 'Mommy' and wrap his arms around her neck, she says, but "he seems to recognize my voice when I sing to him, and he knows that he is loved when he's in his dad's arms. For any child to be loved and comforted, and above all safe, is the bottom line."

More parents than we know about deal with special needs kids, she says. "I'm hoping this book will help them put things into perspective. I cannot take away their pain, but I can help them see that there are ways to celebrate their child's life."

Families need practical help, such as respite care, says Edelson. "People need to break away a little; it is good for the kids, as well. The government needs to provide care for these families so they can live the best life possible under the circumstances. People should not have to fight for every single thing they need."

Although she has been separated from her husband since 1996, he is still very much involved in Jake's care. "Jakey pulls people together," says Edelson.

ANSWERS TO THIS WEEK'S CROSSWORD PUZZLE.



Israeli scientist working to lessen burden of chemotherapy

By ADAM SEGAL
CJN Intern

TORONTO — While chemotherapy is a life-saver for many cancer sufferers, the side effects of the treatment are often painful.

Shmuel Bittner, an Israeli scientist, is hoping to change that.

The 62-year-old organic chemist who has worked at Ben Gurion University (BGU) since it opened in 1968, said the major pitfall of chemotherapy – the treatment that destroys cancer cells – is that it "doesn't differentiate between healthy cells and sick cells. This is the reason your hair falls out… and other bodily functions stop."

Bittner is working on a project that strives to direct chemotherapy specifically at cancerous cells, leaving healthy cells alone.

The technique involves taking a series of compounds known as quinones and bonding them with a hormone called LHRH (luteinizing hormone releasing hormone), which attaches itself to the receptors of cancer cells.

Once the LHRH hormone "attaches itself to sick cells, a signal is triggered and the quinones start to explode," destroying the cancer cells exclusively, Bittner said.

Currently on sabbatical at the University of Toronto, Bittner noted that trial runs of the chemical reaction were successful in test tubes and the technique is now being tested on animal fluids at the Weizmann Institute in Israel.

Although Bittner's project has had positive results thus far, Malcolm Bersohn, an organic chemist, said Bittner's goal is still "a hope, not a fact. Cancer cells are not that different from normal cells, so for a chemical to discriminate [between healthy cells and cancerous cells] is a rare breakthrough."

Bittner has received a three-year grant from the Israel Academy of Science for the project. While in Toronto, he corresponds daily with his colleagues in Israel to check on any new developments in the research.

Bittner recently attended the 10th annual meeting of BGU's Toronto chapter, to thank Canadian donors for supporting scientists and other researchers at BGU.

At the meeting, Michael Wynston, the outgoing president of BGU's Toronto chapter handed over the reigns to new president Barry Lipson.

Wynston noted BGU has seen its student population skyrocket to 15,000 – double that of five years ago. Twenty-five percent of its student population is in the health and natural science fields.

Dental hygienists name new director

TORONTO — The board of the Ontario Dental Hygienists' Association (ODHA) has elected Carolyn Rose as a director.

A registered dental hygienist, Rose brings a broad range of knowledge and expertise to the position. As director, she joins a team of professionals whose main objective is to ensure public access to dental hygiene services.

Dental hygiene is among the largest of the regulated health professions in the province. In working more closely with government and allied health groups, the ODHA hopes to promote dental hygienists as a knowledgeable health resource within the community.

As a member of the board of directors, Rose will take an active role in promoting the ODHA's public campaign during National Dental Hygiene Week, Oct. 15 to 21, and Dental Health Month (April), in a continued effort to build awareness about the role and contributions of dental hygienists.

Established in 1963, the Ontario Dental Hygienists' Association has more than 5,200 members.

Dental hygienists focus on prevention, and, thus make an important contribution to overall health. In addition to cleaning teeth to help prevent cavities and gum disease, they provide examinations of the mouth, neck and tongue. As well, they implement treatments, offer customized home oral care programs and evaluate individual oral care needs. ODHA members are regulated by the College of Dental Hygienists of Ontario.

Muslim Temple Mount building sparks protest

By GIL SEDAN
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

Analysis

It was a rare phenomenon in Israeli public life. Leading Israeli personalities, from writer Amos Oz on the left to former Defence Minister Moshe Arens on the right, were among those signing an ad published in local papers protesting the "intolerable archaeological crime" perpetrated by Muslim officials on Jerusalem's Temple Mount.

The ad, which was also signed by 75 legislators from across the political spectrum, attacked massive construction work conducted by the Wakf, or Islamic religious authority, aimed at expanding their places of worship on the Mount.

The petition urged Prime Minister Ehud Barak to take immediate action to stop the Wakf from continuing the work.

For his part, Barak refused to take such a step. In recent months, thousands of tons of gravel were removed from the construction site, including a considerable number of archeological artifacts, the ad charged. It also said the work was being conducted with no supervision from archeologists.

"I signed the petition as an archeologist, not as a politician," Prof. Trude Dotan of the Hebrew University told JTA. "You don't dig in such a sensitive site with bulldozers."

The controversy erupted just as Israel was trying to persuade the Palestinian Authority to conclude a final peace agreement that would defer what is perhaps the most sensitive issue confronting them – Jerusalem – for future negotiations.

The ad was just the latest chapter in the ongoing controversy over Jerusalem and who would exert control over an emotional centre – the Temple Mount.

For the past two years, Islamic officials, supported by volunteers and money from Israeli Arabs, have been engaged in huge construction works on the Mount. Among their goals was the construction of a third mosque to join the Al-Aksa and Dome of the Rock mosques already at the site.

Israeli officials did not interfere.

A.B. Yehoshua, one of Israel's foremost writers, said he is not concerned that his having signed the newspaper ad may help right-wingers in their campaign against Israel's making any concessions regarding Jerusalem.

"Palestinians should be concerned not to harm archeological assets no less then Jews," Yehoshua told JTA. "I followed my conscience. In my view, sovereignty in the Old City of Jerusalem should be multireligious, and the Palestinians should have their share. But one cannot always justify the Arabs."

Not all archeologists agree that the digging has caused damage.

Veteran archeologist Meir Ben-Dov, a leading expert on digs around the Temple Mount, downplayed the importance of the artifacts that were removed from the site.

Jerusalem Mayor Ehud Olmert is firmly on the other side of the debate. According to Olmert, a supply line of construction material should be cut off at the Lion's Gate, the eastern entrance point to the Old City. This, he reasons, would spare the need to enter the Temple Mount itself to put an end to the work.

"No one suggests that we storm into the Temple Mount compound with bayonets," said Olmert, but "cautious, intelligent" action should be taken "in order for us to regain control of the Temple Mount."

For his part, Barak is in a bind. When the fate of a U.S.-hosted peace summit aimed at reaching a final Israeli-Palestinian peace deal is touch and go, a potential flare-up over Jerusalem is about the last thing he needs.

Following high-level consultations last week, Barak gave Muslim officials approval to continue with tiling work on the Mount, as long as no archeological damage is done.

The prime minister rejected a recommendation by Attorney General Elyakim Rubinstein and the Israel Antiquities Authority to halt or limit the work.

He also vetoed Olmert's recommendation to prevent the entry of heavy machinery, trucks and tractors to the Temple Mount.

Just the same, Barak directed Israeli officials to maintain "reasonable supervision" of the traffic entering and leaving the compound.

"We will do everything to maintain the status quo, but not to change it – not in our favour and not in anyone else's favour," said Danny Yatom, Barak's senior security adviser.

The "status quo" principle won unexpected support last week, when Sephardi Chief Rabbi Eliyahu Bakshi-Doron sent letters to Muslim and Christian clergymen. In the letters, Israel's rabbinical authority stated, for the first time, that the status quo on Temple Mount should be preserved, because any change "could desecrate the sanctity of the site and lead to bloodshed."

The letters infuriated the extreme right.

"Even if you are a chief rabbi," said Itamar Ben-Gvir, a former activist in the now-banned Kach movement, "you cannot decide that the House of God will be under Palestinian administration. This is definitely crossing a red line. This is a black day."

Indeed, Barak is also concerned that right-wing extremists, agitated by the Wakf's construction work may try to break into the site or take other action to protest the damage they claim is being done to sacred Jewish antiquities at the site, where the First and Second Temples stood.

The Arab presence in Jerusalem dates back to 638, when a Muslim army conquered the city.

Meanwhile, Sheik Najah Bakirat of the Islamic Movement, a leading Israeli Arab political party, insisted this week that the construction has caused no damage.

"I can assure you that during the construction work we have found no Jewish" artifacts, he said.

He also maintained that there was "no proof" that was the site of the Jewish Temples. "I suggest that the Jews look for the Temple somewhere else," he said.

Reisses' pitches noticed by Major League teams

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Parents, they say, have no trouble telling identical twins apart. Baseball scouts, on the other hand, may not have it quite that easy, so it's a good thing that Stephen and Michael Reiss wear their numbers on their backs of their jerseys. With skill sets uncannily alike, there's virtually no other way for major league scouts to tell them apart.

Both are six-foot-four, 175-lbs. Both are tremendously competitive high achievers. Both can hurl the ball at a whistling 93 miles per hour; both pitched for their high school baseball team, the Vaughan Voyageurs; both pitched no-hitters for the Voyageurs on the same day; both were in the starting rotation for the Thornhill Reds midgets; both played for Team Ontario; and both will pitch this summer for Canada's national junior team.

Oh yes, both have received offers for full athletic scholarships from the University of Houston. About the only difference between the two is that one uses a changeup as his strike-out pitch, the other a curve.

With tonnes of talent and fiery spirit to boot, the Reiss brothers were among 35 young Canadians chosen recently by Major League teams in the 2000 MLB Draft.

Michael was taken by the Milwaukee Brewers in the 26th round, 771st overall, while Stephen was picked by the Twins in the 27th round, 792nd overall.

Their stock appears to have fallen in the months leading up to the draft, partly as a result of speculation they had committed themselves to the University of Houston and would want fat contracts to dissuade them from college careers.

Last December, six months before the draft, Michael had been ranked as the top Canadian prospect by the Toronto Sun in its annual pre-draft forecast. Baseball America ranked Michael 29th overall in North America.

"Rumours before the draft were that we wanted second round money, $500,000 (US) or $300,000, but that wasn't true," Michael said. "That pushed us down in the draft, and also because we had committed to Houston and because we wanted to be together."

Despite their relatively late selections, both brothers were thrilled to have been drafted. "It was shocking and then, oh my God, all that work paid off," Stephen said. "All the hours I spent working out paid off. It's like a dream come true."

"There are really no words to express how you feel," added Michael. "It's what you worked for all those years. I was just thrilled to be drafted by Milwaukee, a quality organization."

Quality is the kind of word that comes easily to Neil Sagal, their high school baseball coach, when he talks about the twins. "They are outstanding young men," he said.

"These guys are in a league of their own in Canada," he said, but it's the extras they bring that really impressed Sagal. Stephen and Michael often help out coaching younger high school players. "It just makes my day to let them take charge and it's wonderful to see how the youngsters look up to them.... The Grade 9s already have their autographs."

Perhaps one day they'll have their baseball cards too. But despite the high emotions of draft day, both brothers are weighing their futures coolly and rationally. They know their options are open and they probably won't make a final decision until the end of the summer.

Michael and Stephen expect they will be scouted to see how they develop playing for the Canadian juniors. If they play well, they may receive firm offers by mid or late summer. But, says Michael, "It would have to take a substantial offer to change our minds" from going to college next year. After three years in the NCAA both would be eligible to re-enter the draft.

Besides the advantage of staying together for a further three years, playing for the Houston Cougars would expose them to quality coaching, assist their development and provide them with a good education.

The alternative is to sign with Milwaukee and Minnesota, attend instructional camps and play in the rookie league, hoping to move up through A, AA and AAA leagues to the Majors.

Whether it's at college or the pros, it's clear there's going to be plenty of baseball in their lives – just the way they like it.

Remarkably, up until Grade 9 both boys played only softball. They switched to hardball in 1996 when they were recruited to play for Toronto's JCC/Maccabi baseball team.

They had no difficulty making the transition to hardball and they helped lead Toronto to a gold medal at the youth Maccabi Games in Hartford. A year later they won silver in Detroit against much tougher American opposition.

What's more, they enjoyed hardball a lot more than softball. "There's so much more to the game," Stephen said. "There's more setting up of hitters. It's a complex game. It's a lot more fun and a lot more challenging."

As youngsters, they read Nolan Ryan's book on pitching, which helped them develop from throwers into pitchers. And they worked at it relentlessly.

"Everything we do is for baseball. We run, throw, watch games, read books," Stephen said.

"A lot of our success is because we're pretty much on each other's backs 24/7," Michael said. "We keep working and we push each other."

Part of their practices includes "long-tossing," throwing the ball at each other as hard as they can from 120 to 140 feet. "It's pretty much war," Michael said.

Michael was the first to throw a 93 m.p.h. fastball but over last winter, Stephen worked hard on his technique to catch up. "Before that, my mechanics weren't as good," he acknowledged. "This spring, I felt a lot looser and I threw a lot harder."

Stephen believes there's even more room for improvement. A baseball rule of thumb is that you can add 1 m.p.h. for every 10 pounds of weight that is gained. Currently 175 lbs., his goal is to hit 200 and boost his fastball into the 95 or 96 m.p.h. range.

No doubt, Michael feels the same way – or he will once his brother hits the magic number. In the meantime, they're working hard to expand their pitching repertoire. Stephen is working on his changeup while Michael is hoping to improve his curve ball.

Who knows, one day it could be Reiss vs. Reiss in a pitcher's duel when Minnesota and Milwaukee hook up.

About Teens

Dear Karilani,

This summer, most of my friends are going to sleepover camp. But I don't want to go to camp because I am afraid that I'll be too homesick and lonely without my parents. At school some people told me that I was a baby and that camp is really fun, but I am happy with just hanging out at my cottage during the summer instead of going to camp. The problem is that this summer, my parents really want me to try out sleepover camp for at least a week. They say that I will love it and have a great time, but I am still not sure. How do I get over my fear of sleepover camp?

Nervous for Camp

Dear Nervous,

It is true that sleepover camp can be a really fun experience for kids; however, camp is not for everyone. Camp can be a really great experience for kids, but only if they are willing to go and have fun. If you feel that you are being forced to go to camp then do not go, because you should not feel pressured to do things.

But, if there is a part of you that wants to go away to camp, but also a part of you that wants to stay at home, then you should at least try camp and see how you like it. You don't even need to go to overnight camp to get a great summer camping experience.

There are lots of day camps in Canadian cities, where kids can indulge in all of the activities of sleepover camp while still being able to go home at night. Perhaps you want to try out a day camp, and see how you feel about being with friends and away from your parents all day. If you enjoy day camp, then perhaps try spending a week at an overnight camp.

Camp can be a very rewarding and fun experience if you wish to be there, but again do not allow yourself to be pressured into making decisions. You are not a baby for not wanting to go to camp, and you have to remember that all kids (and even their counsellors!) are nervous before the summer. No one knows exactly what to expect, but that is part of the excitement of camp.

Even if there is a little bit of nervous excitement in you, don't hold yourself back from trying new things and seeing if the camp experience is right for you. No matter what you do, I'm sure that you'll have a great summer!

Karilani is a composite name for three girls, who are close friends and in Grade 12 in Toronto

Baycrest Senior's Residence Now Taking Shape

Many are calling Two Neptune Drive: "The Best of Living" for the Independent Senior

Special to the Canadian Jewish News

Construction is now in full swing on the building site just north of Baycrest Hospital on Bathurst. When completed, the structure will feature a community of 120 spacious, value-filled one bedroom, two bedroom, and two bedroom plus den suites.

BUILDING COMFORT & JOY FROM THE GROUND UP

This distinguished property offers a host of amenities to enrich the lives of its life-lease residents. Some of these highlights include:

- landscaped courtyard terrace
- rooftop greenhouse and garden,
- 24-hour concierge
- party room, games room and library
- fully equipped fitness centre and aerobics room
- free shuttle bus to Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care and the Wagman Centre
- Shabbat elevator

Safety and convenience is also given a high priority with extra-wide hallways built with chair rails that function as handrails, and sprinklers throughout the building and suites.

The Chaplin from $237,500

LIVE IT UP IN THE HEART OF THE BAYCREST COMMUNITY

Wider doorways and raised power outlets are a relatively simple matter for the construction industry to incorporate into their building layouts. But for seniors, these "aging in place" features are a very big deal indeed, often allowing you to function much longer without the need for outside assistance.

What are some other enhancements Two Neptune Drive offers the discerning senior? A scan of "The Chaplin", a typical two bedroom suite, is a good example of how Baycrest is continuing its tradition of exceptional service to the senior's community. It also helps explain why over 65% of the 120 suites in this building have sold so quickly.

- Purse or parcel shelf at every suite entrance
- Wider doors to allow easy passage of wheelchairs and walkers
- Living and dining areas awash in natural light
- Many suites with eat-in kitchens
- Easy-to-reach, generous pantries
- Stoves with front control panels for added safety
- Easy-to-grip D-pulls on all cupboard doors
- Convenient, single lever faucets
- Washers and dryers in all suites
- Raised power outlets and lower light switches
- Pre-blocked bathroom walls for installation of grab bars
- Second bedrooms available in some suites for a den, friends, family or a care-giver
- Pre-wiring for cable and phone
- Roomier bathrooms to allow for walkers, bath chairs or other assistance devices
- Water saving, temperature-controlled showers
- Telephones in bathrooms for added safety
- On site emergency response assistance including non-motion detectors

Imagine Living the Good Life at Two Neptune Drive.

Everything for the independent senior and more!

If talks fail

By YOSSI VERTER
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — If the Camp David talks collapse, "a national emergency government is an option to be taken into account," Prime Minister Ehud Barak told Yisrael b'Aliyah leader MK Natan Sharansky in a telephone call Saturday night, Sharansky said recently.

Sharansky claims that all that is needed to form such a government is for Barak to telephone Likud leader MK Ariel Sharon.

However, the Likud issued a statement, declaring that "Barak has no right to divide Jerusalem. He broke his promise to his voters and therefore the Likud will not join a government under him."

Despite this, sources in the Likud said recently that most of the party's senior figures will agree to join an "emergency government" if the summit meeting fails and violence erupts in the territories.

The view in both the Likud and One Israel is that if an agreement is reached at Camp David, but Barak is unable to obtain a parliamentary majority for it and for a referendum, elections will be held early next year.

Camp David

The CJN went to press before the anticipated resolution of the Camp David talks. Full coverage of the outcome will appear in the next issue.

A PRIVATE PRAYER AT THE WESTERN WALL: Veteran Hollywood actor Kirk Douglas, 83, last week visited Jerusalem. In a twist of irony that could have come from one of his movie scripts, Douglas' private visit to the Wall came at the very time that sovereignty over eastern Jerusalem was the main subject at the Camp David summit. Douglas, seen here placing a note between the cracks in the Wall and praying for the note's fulfillment, poignantly symbolizes the Jewish attachment to the place and to the stones of that Wall. [Israel and RNS/Reuters photos]

The News in Brief

CANADA

Order of Canada

OTTAWA — Several Jewish Canadians were among the 103 new appointments to the Order of Canada announced this month by Governor General Adrienne Clarkson.

Promoted to companion, the highest rank within the Order, was Victor Goldbloom, Canada's former Commissioner of Official Languages. Named as a companion was Prof. Raymond Klibansky, professor emeritus at McGill University and an internationally recognized scholar in the history of ancient and modern philosophy.

Named as officers were philanthropist and businessman Edward Bronfman of Toronto; and Montreal's Dr. David Goltzman, chair of medicine and physician-in-chief of the McGill University Health Centre, for health care.

Named as members were longtime community activist Morley Cohen of Montreal for voluntarism; literary translator Sheila Leah Fischman of Montreal for literature; Jack Rabinovitch of Toronto in the field of business and commerce; and Jack Yazer of Sydney, N.S., for philanthropy.

Vandal Sentenced

WINNIPEG — A man who toppled more than 300 headstones at a Jewish cemetery during a drunken rampage has received a nine-month conditional sentence. Russell Frank Martens, 22, of Grunthal, Man., pleaded guilty in May to one count of mischief. Martens must also pay $17,600 in restitution – one-fifth of the nearly $88,000 damage done to the cemetery.

ISRAEL

Extradition Urged

JERUSALEM — The Israel office of the Simon Wiesenthal Centre is urging Latvia to ratify an extradition treaty with Australia and request the transfer of Nazi war criminals Konrads Kalejs and Karlis Ozols. Kalejs lived in Toronto for several years until an immigration adjudicator ruled that he took part in war crimes and did not have the right to remain here.

WORLD

Hillary Denies Slur

NEW YORK — U.S. First Lady Hillary Rodham Clinton described as "an outrageous lie" a new book's claim that she called an aide to her husband a "Jew bastard" after Bill Clinton's unsuccessful bid for Congress in 1974. "I have spent a lifetime devoted to increasing tolerance. This never happened," Rodham Clinton said.

Joseph Mlotek Dies

NEW YORK — Joseph Mlotek, one of North America's best-known Yiddishists, died here this month at age 81. Mlotek was a former editor of the Yiddish Forward. Born in Poland, Mlotek and his family lived briefly in Calgary. Among his survivors are a sister, Sara Rosenfeld of Montreal.

Leonard Baskin Dies

BOSTON — Leonard Baskin, an award-winning sculptor, died near here recently. He was 77. The son of a rabbi, he left a rich legacy of art, including a two-metre Holocaust sculpture in Ann Arbor, Mich., and a bas relief created for the Franklin Delano Roosevelt Memorial in Washington. Among his survivors are a brother, Rabbi Bernard Baskin of Hamilton, Ont.

Shoah Witness Dies

WASHINGTON — Jan Karski, a Polish resistance hero who tried to convince skeptical Allied leaders of the early horrors of the Holocaust, died here July 13. He was 86. A courier for Poland's underground Home Army, Karski witnessed the mass murder of Jews during World War II. But when he reached the West, his stories were disbelieved. A top U.S. judge told him, "I am not saying you are lying, but I don't believe you."

Ready to Talk

LIECHTENSTEIN — This tiny country says it is ready to hold talks on paying compensation for its wartime actions. The announcement came after a Swiss newspaper charged that Liechtenstein helped Nazi officials smuggle money and artwork looted from Jews.

UN Rejects Canada's Stand on Education

GENEVA —The United Nations' human rights committee last week rejected Canada's argument that education is a provincial responsibility, said a special representative appointed to follow up on countries that have failed to implement decisions by the committee.

Christine Chanet met privately last Wednesday with two members of Canada's mission to the UN in Geneva. "We have asked them to find a way to end this discrimination," she said of Ontario's policy of publicly funding Catholic education but not other faith-based schools.

Last February, in response to a complaint from Toronto Jewish parent Arieh Waldman, the UN committee found that Ontario discriminates against non-Catholics and violates an international covenant signed by Canada.

Chanet declined to give further details of Wednesday's half-hour discussion, which she described as "an ordinary meeting."

However, she noted that the committee rejects Canada's explanation that education is a provincial matter.

"It is the state that is in charge of implementing the covenant, not the provinces," she said.

Day's ascension places him under microscope

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Not since the days of Social Credit, with its evocations of hellfire Prairie populism and unvarnished anti-Semitism, have national politics grabbed the attention of Canadian Jewry as the ascension of Stockwell Day to the leadership of the Canadian Alliance.

Persistent rumours linking Day to anti-Semitism – unsubstantiated though they have been – mean Jewish leaders and voters are paying close attention to the new leader, watching not only how he comports himself but what statements he will make to soften, at least, the strong right-wing views associated with his Christian fundamentalist past.

"There's a lot more to learn about him," commented Moshe Ronen, president of Canadian Jewish Congress. "He's still a relative unknown."

In the coming days CJC will be looking for statements from Day that will repudiate and condemn the intolerance to which the new leader has been linked.

"To say, 'I'm not an anti-Semite' is good and important, but the next step is equally important: to condemn those who espouse such views," Ronen told The CJN.

In the meantime, "I think we have to give him the benefit of the doubt, but it's important for him to express himself.

"There's no reason for the community to fear the election of Mr. Day." CJC, he added, "is not in fear mode."

Congress will also be meeting with Day in the coming months to air the community's priorities, which include prosecuting war crimes, establishing a Holocaust museum in Ottawa, the state of Canada-Israel relations, and the fight in Ontario over the provincial government's refusal to fund religious and independent schools.

Congress sent Day a letter congratulating him on his victory and offering best wishes. But CJC turned down a meeting with Day prior to the July 8 Canadian Alliance convention. Ronen said Congress thought it "inappropriate" to meet with a candidate prior to the leadership vote.

B'nai Brith Canada had no such qualms. Its leaders met with Day in Toronto the day before the convention.

At that meeting, Day repeated his plan to offer parents of children in faith-based schools a federal tax credit as a way to ease inequality with Ontario's publicly funded Catholic system.

At a June 1 meeting at Beth Jacob School for Girls, Day's team claimed to have signed up 400 Jewish members from the Orthodox community who were drawn to his promise on education funding.

At the meeting with B'nai Brith, Day also reportedly expressed his support for Israel.

"My policy would be one of pro-Israel – a very supportive approach," Day was quoted as saying. "It would be a supportive, friendly, pro-Israel policy I would be proposing."

Over the past few weeks, Day has found himself fending off questions about anti-Semitism.

One accusation maintained that Day, when he was an administrator of a Pentecostal school in Alberta, sanctioned a curriculum with anti-Semitic undertones.

At one of the televised debates between Day and former leader Preston Manning, a 15-year-old high school student asked whether Day ever said that Jews were children of the devil, referring to a worksheet Day used in his school, asking whether it was true or false that "Jewish leaders are children of their father, the devil."

"That is absolutely, categorically, 1,000 percent false," Day replied angrily.

Day responded in a similar fashion when a reporter asked earlier this month, "Sir, do you still believe Jews are children of the devil?"

Day replied that the question was "ridiculous," noting that he had been gratified by support from the Jewish community in his campaign to lead the Alliance.

Anne Frank's diary at Stratford

We knew it would happen. But even that foreknowledge provided very little shelter for our heavily stretched emotions.

It is the penultimate scene of the play. The five adults sit around the table bantering, distracted, their backs turned away from the attic door on the stage floor. The three teenagers are in Peter's "room" engaged in their own discussions, paying scant attention either to their parents or to any thing else on stage.

The door opens.

Suddenly, rising onto the stage from underneath the floor is an officer in an SS uniform. With him are the two collaborators. In the audience one can literally hear choked-back breath-catching in the throats of some trembling individuals.

There was no warning, no emotional or other preparation for us.

Like serpents coiling up through the cracks in the attic, the villains steal onto the stage unnoticed by the helpless victims and the disbelieving audience. Gruffly, brutally, with hooligan shouts and menacing threats of violence, they round up their pitiful, frightened, human prey.

In a mere instant of the pounding of one's heart, they are all gone. Taken away. Disappeared.

It happens so fast.

The audience is numb, frozen in its own silence.

During the brutal betrayal scene, as the focus of the audience is pinned on the unfolding doom of the eight hideaways, the setting imperceptibly changes.

The stage is now empty of players.

The annex has been transformed into a backdrop for the train tracks at a death camp, perhaps even Auschwitz. The imprisoning barbed wires are silhouetted against the background. Smoke and ash seem to rise from the floor.

Otto Frank, the only survivor of the eight real-life characters, returns to the stage to tell us of the final fates of the other seven, and, of course, to find his daughter, Anne's, diary.

The play ends as the stage darkens even more, except for one last feeble light that shines on the diary. The diary, we are told by the noble but grieving father, is "all that remains."

He was correct only literally.

But he was incorrect both dramatically and inspirationally. For his daughter's diary was destined to become far more than a reminder of someone who had once lived. More than a half-century after it was written, the diary remains a Rosetta stone helping to make intelligible on an individual scale the wholly unintelligible mass scale of the Shoah; it is also a magnetic needle pointing the way for our inquisitive, seeking youth, to the often obscured direction of goodness and hope.

Anne Frank

The Stratford production of The Diary of Anne Frank – the first ever undertaken by the company – was simply superb. Its impact on the audience was powerful and stunning.

After a few moments, once the audience had rebounded from silence at the end of the play like an athlete's slow recovery from a brief physical exhaustion, the applause in the small Avon Theatre was deafening – an emotional catharsis by an exceedingly appreciative audience.

The actors deftly conveyed the claustrophobia, fear, frustration and vulnerability of the victims' plight. Even during intermission they remained on stage, in character. The audience members left their seats, stretched their legs, sought refreshments, but the actors, true to the predicament of their roles, and to emphasize the point, were prisoners of their attic.

The entire company was excellent, but special plaudits must be directed to Maggie Blake, who played the role of Anne, and to Lally Cadeau, who played the role of Petronella van Daan.

Blake was a completely believable Anne, struggling with the tragedy of her situation and the turbulence of her teenagehood. Cadeau evoked the self-conscious strain of the role with aching empathy.

Maggie Blake

But as fulfilling as the performances were, it was Al Waxman's direction that elevated the play from genuine and authentic to insightful and poignant.

For example when Mr. Dussel was standing off to one corner praying with his prayer shawl and siddur, the prayer on his lips was "Sim shalom," namely, "bring about peace." The non-Jewish audience, while impressed with the authenticity of the action, could not have understood the deeper significance of the words of the actual prayer.

Throughout the play, Anne's father called her "Annika." No parent in the audience could be unmoved at the tenderness of the gesture or the inevitability of the fates that we knew, alas, awaited them.

The Diary of Anne Frank at Stratford is an outstanding production.

Consulate's Waidergorn returns to Israel

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Although she hated the winters, Irit Waidergorn will miss Toronto after almost four years as Israel's consul to Ontario and western Canada.

As second-in-command at the Israeli Consulate (after consuls general Jehudi Kinar and more recently Meir Romem), Waidergorn had a variety of responsibilities.

"Not one day can be compared to another," the Tel Aviv native said.

In an interview at the consulate before her July 20 return to Israel, Waidergorn, 31, was hard-pressed to single out professional highlights of her Toronto stint. "There were so many," she said.

After reflecting briefly, she offered, "When you go to speak to a group, and the communication is wonderful, we both come out of this enriched.

"When you see an Israeli artist performing and you see the audience shouting 'Bravo!' – it's an honour.

"When you get thank-you letters from people you helped."

Irit Waidergorn

On a personal level, one event surpassed everything. In March 1999 Waidergorn became engaged to Guy Savion, whom she met shortly after her arrival in Toronto. They will be married in Israel in September.

Savion's name will be familiar to Torontonians who remember his father, Udi, as Toronto's aliyah shaliach from 1993 to 1996. Guy Savion studied Hospitality and Tourism Management at Ryerson Polytechnic University and is now working in the food industry in Israel.

In Israel, the couple may be known for a Toronto guidebook they co-authored, which was published through an Israeli newspaper.

But there were difficult moments for Waidergorn here too. Probably the toughest was informing an Israeli parent that his child had been killed in an accident. "I will not forget that day," she said quietly, her vivaciousness momentarily quelled.

Her office reflected a flurry of activity as she prepared for the arrival of her successor Zehavit Ben Hillel, who like Waidergorn came to her Canadian posting from South America.

Ben Hillel served most recently in Lima, Peru; Waidergorn, who has a B.A. in political science from Tel Aviv University, arrived in Toronto after postings in Brasilia and São Paolo, Brazil.

Over the course of her diplomatic career, Waidergorn feels she has developed personally and professionally. "I've learned so much."

She returned to Israel to take the position of first secretary in Israel's Ministry of Foreign Affairs, department of French-speaking countries, western Europe division.

Waidergorn believes her most important lesson as a consul was what it means to be a Jew outside of Israel. "In Israel it's not a challenge to be Jewish. Here you have to go to shul, look for a kosher supermarket, you have to tell your boss you don't want to work on Rosh Hashanah and Yom Kippur."

She also learned about the importance of Conservative and Reform Judaism and the connection between Diaspora and Israeli Jews. "This is something I'm taking back to Israel with me... what it means to be Jewish and how I can have a better bond with Jewish communities in the world, because I think this is one of the most important things Israel has."

> 'Not one day can be compared to another'

To Waidergorn's knowledge, no other Diaspora community celebrated Israel's 50th birthday in a way that compared to Toronto, with its Canadian National Exhibition pavilion.

She remains optimistic about Israel's political future. It will take "maybe a generation, probably two" to achieve peace, she believes. "You have to educate a whole new generation to accept its neighbour and not to hate it."

Politically, even though there were moments when the Toronto community "was mad at Israel," she recalled, the friendship was always there.

Ideology and Family Law

Family Matters

by

John Syrtash, B.A. (Hon.), LL.B.

If you have some interest in world events, history and the language of ideas, please indulge me by allowing, for purposes of discussion, the following three assumptions:

1. Communism is bad.
2. A constitutional Democracy and free market economy coupled with the rule of law is good. This is true notwithstanding all its inconsistencies, blemishes and entrenched poverty in many of our communities.
3. Fidel Castro is a brutal dictator. He terrorizes his people like any previous Communist dictator. His conduct brought the world to the brink of nuclear destruction. He continues to arrest and imprison ordinary non-violent citizens for daring to voice democratic ideals that Canadians take for granted. He lives a good life and runs a corrupt government while his people are impoverished; many of them have even turned to prostitution just to survive. Large numbers of these innocent citizens have been driven away from Cuba directly because of him and his Communist government.
4. The "Cuban relatives" and extremist elements of the Miami Cuban community who fought the return of Elian Gonzales to his father put their hatred for Castro above the love of a father for his son. Their theatrics were absurd. Their thinking is akin to the same problems that all ideologies have, including Communism — the very system they so wholly oppose.

What is the problem of ideology when mixed with family law?

Ideology takes one assumption such as "All history is the history of class struggle" (Marxism) or that the Jews are the source of all evil (Nazism). Every statement or course of conduct then must derive from these assumptions, even if the results make no common sense. The consequences of ideological behavior by nations and entire peoples are always bad, ranging from racial prejudice to mass genocide.

Principles of conduct and morality

Then what is family law? In fact, does family law not also lay down certain guiding principles of conduct and morality? Do not ideological assumptions also influence the decisions of family law Judges?

Initially, a certain local Judge in Miami may have caved to the intense pressure of her own Cuban/American community. Virtually all of the Judges subsequently involved in this case dismissed the proceedings brought by the Cuban relatives to keep Elian away from his father. Was this an ideological position? Was it legal? What's the difference? And why should you care?

Ideology is so rigid that it disregards any facts that weaken its foundation. Indeed, it often "changes" them and essentially lies in order to make sense of the world through its rose-coloured glasses. When Elian was reunited with his father, the Cuban relatives claimed that he did not really want to be with him. So, pictures were produced showing obvious affection between father and son. These relatives then claimed that the pictures were not current because of the boy's haircut. New pictures had to be shown. Meanwhile, Castro labelled the entire Miami Cuban community — known to its peers as a group of successful and responsible Americans — "gangsters" and "criminals".

Trapped in a spiral of syllogistic "logic"

Good family law Judges and lawyers apply basic principles, such as the primary right of a father to make decisions on behalf of his young child (Elian's case). But they do so after examining the facts of each particular case. As a rule, they do not make sweeping statements about the role of men or women or parents. Good jurists say: "Okay. We have this general principle. But does it apply to these facts? Is this father capable of making such decisions, or is someone else in a better position because the father is mentally challenged or irresponsible or a substance abuser, etc.?" In short, good law applied properly allows all of us to breathe like human beings, not as robots trapped in a spiral of syllogistic "logic". And yet, at the same time, it aspires to give us all some sense of what might be expected of us.

I am always reminded of a young Vietnamese boy who, at the tender age of eight, was interviewed as one of the "boat people" who escaped from Communist Vietnam shortly after arriving in Canada. He was asked what he most appreciated about this country. We could have easily guessed that his answer would allude to the material riches that surround us: television, the abundance of food, good shelter, toys and other gifts bestowed on these refugees — especially the children. But no. His answer was quite simple: "I like Canada because here you have Laws that let us know what to expect."

Canada's competing ideologies

So why should this affect our perspective of Canadian family law? After all, what happened with Elian is unlikely to happen here. Our judiciary has greater immunity to political pressures; they are not elected, nor are they even interviewed by our politicians before being appointed.

The problem is that in Canada we also face competing ideological pressures, even though they don't usually manifest themselves in street demonstrations or riots. They do, however, affect many Judges and lawyers. Male rights groups and feminist groups have developed their own "closed systems of ideas" or ideologies that do not consider the need to assess all the facts of each case, but only do so selectively. We even see different Canadian newspapers appearing to lend support to one family law ideology over another. For example, a cursory and subjective perusal of some recent journalistic exposés of family abuse might suggest that virtually all ex-husbands are either (a) deadbeats who could pay child or spousal support under Court orders, but don't; or (b) wife batterers; or (c) both of the above. A more thorough and objective review of these articles, however, sheds light on many systemic problems that need to be addressed. Most importantly, as a direct result of this type of publicity, some men have been compelled to pay badly needed arrears of support.

On the other hand, you rarely see articles about how access parents (usually husbands) are often deprived of their rights to see their children, and how the women who deny such access often do so without penalty. The cumulative effect of this journalistic focus is to create an extremely negative image of ex-husbands as a group. It may not be intentional, but it is real.

Husbands often denied access

One exception to this trend is the recent article about a man who committed suicide after being ordered to pay monies he honestly didn't have. Generally, recent journalistic efforts to highlight the difficulty that many men have in seeing their children have been confined to publications with a "men's rights" orientation. What they reveal is that Court orders for such access are often ignored, despite the efforts of well-paid lawyers to have Judges enforce them. Many female custodial parents ignore such orders even under threat of a jail sentence. To this day, there is no effective legislation to deal with this scenario, since Judges shy away from sending such women to jail or even imposing large fines. Their concern: How will their jail time or fines serve the children's best interests? Some men complain that the support they are being ordered to pay exceeds their ability to do so and maintain a reasonable lifestyle, while women's groups complain the monies they receive are not nearly enough.

Who's right? Which sex's predicament is worse? Which ideology do we choose from?

The answer: We don't. We must eradicate ideology in family law. It is an evil that could destroy the common sense needed to sensitively deal with each crisis and issue on a "fact by fact" basis. We encourage dialogue and look for guiding principles of law to assist us in dealing with each case, but not dogmatically.

Otherwise, we are going to become hostages of ideology — just like Elian Gonzales.

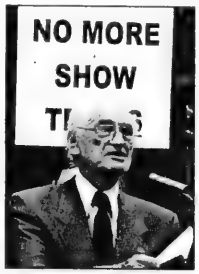
Protesters demand release of Iran 10

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — In a scene reminiscent of mass rallies for Soviet Jewry 25 years ago, hundreds of protesters gathered in downtown Toronto to demand that Iran release 10 Jews imprisoned for spying for Israel.

The Toronto rally in front of the law courts at Old City Hall was part of a much larger effort by Jewish communities across Canada and around the world to protest the conviction of Iranian Jews on trumped up spying charges. Vigils were held in Ottawa, Vancouver and Halifax while an earlier gathering was held in Montreal.

In New York, a crowd estimated by police at 2,000 gathered near the United Nations to express solidarity with the "Iran 10." Speakers included Nobel laureate Elie Wiesel and Richard Holbrooke, U.S. Ambassador to the United Nations.



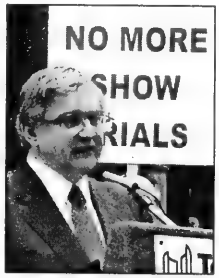
Rabbi Plaut

In Toronto Rabbi Gunther Plaut quoted the prophet Moses in calling on Iran to "let my people go."

The trial in Iran had "as much credibility as the show trials of the former Soviet Union," Rabbi Plaut said. "We call on Iran's leadership to overthrow the mockery of justice carried out by a kangaroo court."

Lawyer Eddie Greenspan spared no rhetorical punches, tearing into Iranian authorities as a "tyrannical bunch of bullies" who foisted an "absurd" and "farcical show trial."

He called on Prime Minister Jean Chrétien to recall Canada's ambassador from Teheran and to order the Iranian charge d'affaires in Ottawa to return to Iran "until the Shiraz 10 are freed."



Edward Greenspan

Greenspan called the trial, based exclusively on confession evidence, "an injustice" and "merely an expression of anti-Zionism and anti-Semitism."

News reports indicated Iran has ignored the rallies and had issued an arrest warrant for Rabbi Eshaq Belanas, an Iranian who settled in New York nine years ago. Iranian authorities view Rabbi Belanas as the mastermind behind the alleged spy ring, the Jewish Telegraphic Agency reported.

Malcolm Hoenlein, executive vice chair of the Conference of Presidents of Major American Jewish Organizations, told JTA there is concern for Rabbi Belanas' safety in the United States.

Meanwhile, Germany, Iran's largest trading partner, welcomed visiting Iranian President Mohammad Khatami with full military honours. Chancellor Gerhard Schroeder reportedly brought up the fate of the Shiraz 10 as well as the case involving a group of Iranians detained after attending a human rights seminar in Germany.

The chancellor, who had ignored calls by U.S. Jewish groups to cancel Khatami's visit, also promised to increase export guarantees and broaden cultural and scientific ties with Iran.

Iran's foreign minister said the Islamic republic would resist U.S. pressure to free the 10 Jews. Iran will not "pay any price" to normalize relations with Washington, Kamal Kharrazi told the London-based al-Hayat newspaper.

A lidele in Yiddish

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Classical Yiddish songs held sway recently when 1,500 members of the Jewish community attended a program of Yiddish music.

The 30th annual concert arranged by UJA FEDERATION's committee for Yiddish and hosted by Beth Tzedec Synagogue was a chance for the artists and the audience to enjoy the old Yiddish classics – everyone joined in to sing Ale Brider with Michael Mandel, Gloria Valentine, Stella Walker and the klezmer musicians.

The concert's theme was 1,000 Years of Yiddish (give or take a few years, more or less, as chair Ethel Sum Cooper put it), and featured narration by folksinger Naomi Bell, who referred to "the stunning revival of klezmer music," in her crisp history of the Jewish people.

Then, in a tribute to the millions of immigrants who came to the goldene medina, David Abramsky, executive director of the United Jewish Peoples Order, spoke of the "sweatshop poets" who wrote in the garment district of New York.

The concert illustrated the growing force of women in Yiddishkeit when Valentine, her arm raised in defiance, declared: "Working women unite. Let's make this a better world," before she sang the lyrics of Arbeter froyen.

The audience responded with warmth when Mandel sang the witty and sarcastic Vi azoy lebt der keyser.

The love of Yiddish classics was also evident in the audience's response to A lidele in Yiddish, Yidl mit'n fidl, Kinder yorn, Hopkele and Di mezinke oysgegebn.

"Who can forget Molly Picon dressed as a boy, going through the Polish countryside, singing Yidl mit'n fidl?" Valentine asked.

The professional quality was a result of the hard work of concert convener Bess Shockett and music co-ordinator Eric Stein, Cooper told The CJN.

The musicians, in addition to Stein, who played mandolin and cymbals, included Steve Greenman, viola; Bert Higgins, bass; Sasha Luminsky, accordian; and Martin Van der Ven, clarinet.

In 1935, of more than 16 million Jews living in the world, 10.6 million were Yiddish speakers, said Cooper, who outlined the federation's efforts to keep the language alive, including offering classes for children and adults.

"Yiddish is an important part of our culture to be given to our children and grandchildren," said Glennie Lindenberg of UJA FEDERATION. She gave part of her remarks in what she called "broken Yiddish," taught to her by her mother, Rosie Brown.

Beth Tzedec president Bob Cohen, describing himself as a great believer in carrying on Yiddish, said he always spoke to his parents in Yiddish.

In bringing greetings from the city and promising financial support for the concert in years ahead, Councillor Howard Moscoe produced a huge, beribboned derby he described as an Israelite hat. He said he would have Mayor Mel Lastman autograph the hat, which he will give to the first person who donates $100 to the committee for Yiddish.

Unsettling signs

As these words are being written, Israeli and Palestinian leaders have been in Camp David for 14 days trying to negotiate an end to the modern, century-old conflict between their two peoples. That is the declared aim of the Israeli delegation only. One cannot be as sanguine about the Palestinian intention.

Yasser Arafat refuses to give definitive proof of such an intention. He will not do so until – if at all – he is granted sovereignty over east Jerusalem, at least. But the Western Wall and the Jewish quarter of the Old City are in east Jerusalem. Whatever other agreements may have been reached between the two sides in the past two weeks, an agreement that effectively cedes the Western Wall to Palestinian control can never be. Thus there is an impasse in the negotiations.

Fresh from his meeting in Japan of the G-8 countries, U.S. President Bill Clinton, was to try to help resolve the impasse. But there were unsettling signs that the impasse would not readily be resolved, for by claiming east Jerusalem on behalf of the entire Muslim world, as he did last weekend, Arafat converted the conflict from one between contending peoples to one between contending religions. Thus, to a conflict already encrusted with violence, distrust and hatred, Arafat has ominously added the possible explosive of even more extremism and fanaticism.

Complicating the situation last weekend was the unwelcome statement by Pope John Paul II, who called for Jerusalem to fall under special international status. Only with special status for Jerusalem, the Pope said, could religious freedoms be guaranteed for all religions.

Such remarks are unhelpful in the extreme. They merely add to the considerable tension already enshrouding the negotiations. Moreover, the pontiff's declaration was, to put it charitably, disingenuous.

Religious freedoms to all the holy places in Jerusalem are presently guaranteed by Israel and have been since June 1967. Each denomination controls and manages its own holy sites.

The only people to have been denied access to their holy sites in recent times was the Jewish people during the period of 1948-1967, after the Jewish quarter fell into Jordanian hands in Israel's War of Independence. Synagogues, graves and other holy Jewish sites were vandalized and desecrated by the Jordanian religious establishment.

The Pope knows this. The issue for him and his Vatican advisors, therefore, is not access to holy places but ultimate control over the territory in which they reside. It bothers them still, that such control rests in Jewish hands. By declaring so openly against Israel's entitlement to Jerusalem, the Pope has virtually dissipated the goodwill he assiduously established during his visit to Israel last March.

LET OUR PEOPLE GO

On July 1, in the city of Shiraz in Iran, the Iranian Revolutionary Court convicted 10 Jews on the false charge of spying for Israel. They were sentenced to between four and 13 years imprisonment. Each one must be remembered. They are: Javeed Beit Yakov, Ramin Farzam, Nasser Levi Haim, Farzad Kashi, Faramarz Kashi, Ramin Nemati, Shahrokh Paknahad, Farhad Saleh, Hamid Tefileen and Asher Zadmehr.

Torching of synagogue tragic

What are we to make of the torching of a Conservative synagogue in Israel? First we must use terms carefully. The reports said that the people who were seen running away appeared to be religious Jews. That cannot be true for one simple reason. Anyone who is engaged in an act as heinous as that one, by definition cannot call himself or herself religious.

Secondly, I agree with Rabbi Shlomo Riskin who recently wrote: "My synagogue was set in flames this past Saturday." Asked why he called the Yaar Ramot Synagogue his synagogue, he explains: "If my friend's synagogue is vandalized today by those who are anti-Conservative, a religious Zionist synagogue can be vandalized tomorrow by those who are anti-religious Zionism, and a Satmar synagogue can be vandalized next week by those who are anti-Satmar."

Third, it seems to me that there is a fundamental misunderstanding as to what is the real religious problem in Israel. I would ask the arsonist this: "Where would you rather Jews be on Shabbat? In a synagogue, whatever synagogue it is, or on the beach in Tel Aviv?"

There is such a rift between the religious and secular in Israel that it seems anyone attempting to make Judaism more accessible should be welcomed.

Finally, the great teacher of Ahavat Yisrael, Rabbi Tzvi Yehuda Kook taught that there is a prohibition against speaking lashon hara about those who act with the intention of helping to strengthen the Jewish people. Even if you disagree with a specific individual or movement's methods, a commitment to support and serve the Jewish people creates a virtual immunity against slander. If this prohibition extends to mere words, how much more so should it extend to physical harassment.

Peace Now supports Barak

As Peace Now in Israel has long called upon Israel to be ready – under the appropriate conditions – to make major territorial compromises, it supports the government of Prime Minister Ehud Barak in its efforts, and hopes that Yasser Arafat and the Palestinian Authority – their hardline statements and rock-throwing notwithstanding – will prove to be equally flexible and realistic. Nothing short of an enduring peace agreement between Israeli and Palestinians is at stake.

Laments vigil turnout

I applaud the organizations involved in co-ordinating the recent solidarity vigil for the Shiraz 10 – the Jews sentenced in Iran for spying. The speakers delivered eloquent messages about the need for Jews and others to speak out against the "anti-Semitism" and "clown-like environment" at the trial in Iran.

It was very disappointing, however, that the Jewish community composed of 185,000 members was able to muster only a few hundred individuals to attend the vigil. I therefore challenge all of Toronto's Jewish community to cut out the names of the Shiraz 10, post them in a conspicuous place, and make an effort to pray, lobby and battle on behalf of those Jews suffering the cowardice of hatred and anti-Semitism we swore we would fight against.

Parents need not have been 'ambushed'

Re: "CHAT expands northward for Grade 9 students" (CJN, July 6). Let me say at the outset that I care a great deal about CHAT, both personally and in terms of the very significant and larger role it serves in educating the youth of our community.

However, I feel particularly offended by CHAT's assertion that it only "became aware of the empty high school on Wednesday, June 14." The fact of matter is that I brought this to the board's attention at its January 1999 regular board meeting 17 months ago. At the time, I was a member of the CHAT board and had just been elected as vice-chair of the York Region District School Board.

During the course of that meeting I informed the CHAT board of the existence and availability of the RHHS site. The response was that "it was off the beaten path," that "no one will travel there," etc. Frankly, until reading of the CHAT board's decision in The CJN, I had presumed that it was a dead idea.

I do not mean this as either support for or criticism of the RHHS site as a second campus for CHAT. However, there was no need for parents to be ambushed with this decision.

'Deep existential fear among the settlers'

By AMOS HAREL
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

"In all my years in the territories, I cannot remember a period of such uncertainty," a senior IDF officer said this week.

"None of the parties involved – the army, the Palestinians, the settlers – really know what is going on. What does or does not happen at Camp David will affect them all, at the most personal level: where they will live, where they will be able to work. The result is an enormous pressure cooker that can easily explode."

Very few IDF officers knew in real time what was happening at the summit. The IDF's representative at the talks, head of the planning branch Maj.-Gen. Shlomo Yanai, was up on the details, as was the chief of staff, Lt.-Gen. Shaul Mofaz.

A few other senior officers present at the summit, but not in the inner forum, knew even less. All the rest, including those division and brigade commanders who will have to cope with the results of the summit on the ground, were completely in the dark.

A senior general staff officer, one of the few who was periodically updated, strove to remain optimistic.

"One must not forget that the Palestinians attach great importance to international recognition of their declaration of independence. They understand that there are steps from which there would be no return. I am not at all sure that they are eager to sacrifice people for independence, even though this is the standard assessment in Israel.

"Declaration of a state that is not accompanied by changes on the ground won't be a cause for rejoicing from their point of view. They also know that Israel has a lot of leverage. We haven't yet used even one percent of our force."

If no agreement is reached at the summit, this officer predicts worsening conflict – but not necessarily an immediate deterioration into a large-scale violent confrontation.

"This isn't an existential security danger," he said. "But one must understand that a long conflict will not remain in the territories – it is likely to spill over the Green Line and the Lebanese border. It will also re-ignite political and social conflicts within Israel in full force."

Two incidents in the territories at the beginning of the week, which did not attract much media attention, lit a warning light for the defence establishment – the torching of three Israeli buses in the Qalandiyah refugee camp north of Jerusalem and a fight between Jewish and Arab residents of Hebron. Both indicate that the tension in the territories is growing and little is needed to set them alight.

The incident in Qalandiyah was reminiscent of the days of the intifadah: Four Israeli buses, en route to pick up settlers to take them to a demonstration in Tel Aviv, took a wrong turn and entered the refugee camp. The buses were met with a hail of rocks.

The four drivers, who were lightly injured, ran away, leaving three of the buses behind. The buses were then set on fire by youths from the camp.

The security forces see the incident as evidence of the tension in the street – Israeli buses usually drive past Qalandiyah daily without trouble. "This shows to what degree the street is tensing up," said one defence source.

In Hebron, it was the settlers who initiated the incident. A Jewish girl complained that an Arab youth had tried to hug and kiss her. In response, dozens of settlers rioted, beating Palestinians and damaging property.

The situation might have been inflamed by the local elections in Kiryat Arba, just outside Hebron, which were scheduled to take place later that week. But it also reflected the settlers' fears that the agreement being negotiated at Camp David could result in their being forced out of their homes.

Security sources say they sense "deep existential fear" among the settlers, and in Hebron, there have been increasingly extreme statements to the effect that no matter what majority decides it, evacuating settlements is illegitimate.

Against this background, the IDF is completing its preparations for possible conflict. Deputy Defence Minister Ephraim Sneh has called several meetings to co-ordinate the preparations. The planning branch has drafted an order describing various possible situations and issuing instructions for how the army should behave in these scenarios.

The army will soon decide whether to bring troops from the Lebanese border into the territories before September, when the Palestinians are planning to declare statehood.

It is possible that the Palestinians will try to maintain relative quiet in the territories until mid-September, a senior defence official told Ha'aretz.

That official noted that the two violent clashes between the IDF and the Palestinians which occurred in May 1998 and this past May, ended with a large number of Palestinian casualties. In both cases, the Palestinian Authority could not show that anything had been gained from the conflict.

"I hope the...clashes have shown them that violence doesn't pay," he added.

The official denied an accusation by Abd al-Razeq al-Majaideh, the head of the Palestinian security forces in Gaza, that Israel was beefing up its forces in Gaza in preparation for an assault.

The IDF has deliberately refrained from taking such a step, the official said, out of fear that the Palestinians would misinterpret it.

"The preparatory measures we have taken have been primarily defensive and have been low-profile," he continued. "The Palestinians claim we have brought 50 new tanks into [the settlement of] Netzarim [in Gaza]. In reality, we have not brought in a single tank, because we understand that such a move would create the mistaken impression that we are planning to attack them.

"We are not planning any attack. We will consider switching to offensive measures only if things deteriorate into a violent conflict accompanied by shooting."

However, the official added, the IDF cannot let the Palestinians take actions such as blocking the road to Netzarim for a day or two.

"There is also no situation in which we would let a Palestinian march enter an Israeli settlement," he said. "The Netzarim Junction or Moshave Netzer-Hazani are not the Taibeh outpost in Lebanon. If necessary, we will make them understand that it is not worth their while to approach the settlement borders."

The official said the PA had made a serious mistake when it decided to arm activists in Tanzim, which is a Fatah-affiliated organization.

"This was not only a violation of the Oslo agreement, [but] the Tanzim's weapons are also liable to be turned against them," he said.

"If weapons are fired at Netzarim Junction, I don't care whether the person who fires is a member of the Tanzim, Hamas or a Palestinian policeman," he continued. "We will return fire with intent to injure. As was the case this May, precise, effective and fatal shooting will be directed against anyone who raises a weapon against us."

If the summit ends in complete failure, without a new round of talks scheduled, this move to bring troops from the Lebanese border into the territories will be advanced. In the event of severe escalation, some of the reserves could be called up, mostly in support roles, such as communications, intelligence and technology.

The IDF is essentially preparing for war. This is how an army thinks, even if in the end, the conflict turns out to be on a smaller scale. And the IDF is more focused on the territories now that Lebanon, the problem that occupied most of its time and resources over the last decade, is on the back burner.

Sleeping in public

A headline such as the one above quite naturally attracted my interest. Having for many years preached from the pulpit and for more than two decades having sat in the congregation, I am not unfamiliar with the phenomenon of public sleeping, induced by fatigue on the part of the listener, or boredom, or whatever.

Rabbi Gunther Plaut in Toronto

I have also observed it in movie theatres from time to time, though in a darkened room sleeping in public is detected only when it is accompanied by snoring.

But this rumination aside, the article turned out to be more serious. It described how in a California city, citizens were up in arms because there were too many homeless people around, who, having to sleep somewhere, chose what appeared to be the only alternative: sleeping in public.

Now the guardians of communal well-being have decided to clamp down on these offenders, called "bums" or worse by many of the worthy citizens of the community. Which reminds me of the time when Holy Blossom Temple first proposed to begin its Out of the Cold program, designed to ease the burdens of a lot of those who were hungry and homeless, by providing food and indoor sleeping quarters at least once a week.

This program, which has since proven itself to be a wonderfully well-received effort to ease the fate of homeless people, was first met with the kind of reaction now found in California. The complainants did not indicate where these people ought to go, and their emphasis was clearly on their own comfort – or rather discomfort.

I read the description of this moral disaster with increasing disbelief. There was very little indication in the article that citizens had banded together to attack the root problem, which is poverty in the midst of affluence.

It led me to think of the expression "the good old days," which referred to the 1890s. But as I learned long ago, that time was good for only five percent of North Americans. The rest either lived in very modest circumstances, or worked in sweatshops and lived in run-down tenement housing. It was the "good old days" for the few well-to-do who controlled the media.

We have been told repeatedly that we live in splendid days, and for many people that is the case. But this splendour does not extend to a growing minority about whom we hear little and whom we see occasionally in unexpected places.

The problem we face is not just economics. It also has to do with morality, sensitivity and an awareness that we can never be quite at ease when others suffer.

Israel plays the host

Officials at Ben-Gurion International Airport near Tel Aviv can be forgiven if they're becoming blasé at the sight of foreign dignitaries landing in Israel. For a tiny country, especially one once scorned for so long by much of the world, Israel now receives a remarkably high number of top-level diplomatic visitors from abroad.

Robert Sarner in Jerusalem

Rare is the week that some president, prime minister or foreign minister does not come to Jerusalem to meet with Israeli leaders.

Residents of the capital know that the sudden appearance of foreign flags fluttering from lamp poles on the city's main arteries signals the arrival of yet another VIP from distant lands. Local inhabitants also know that the more prominent the visitor, the more disruptive the visit.

Such events may augur well for Israel's international standing but they complicate life for many Jerusalemites.

In an all too familiar scenario, residents are subjected to beefed-up security measures that bedevil the city's already snarled traffic situation.

Police impose special parking restrictions and block off streets before, during and after a dignitary's motorcade passes by, leaving motorists fuming in its wake.

Last spring, Canadian Prime Minister Jean Chrétien made huge headlines back home during his visit to Israel. In contrast, his stay was a minor story in the Israeli press.

Chrétien had the misfortune of arriving in Israel shortly after Pope John Paul II's historic pilgrimage and just ahead of the much-anticipated visit of Chinese President Jiang Zemin.

In the span of a few weeks, once unthinkable scenes played out for Israeli and international media: First, the leader of the world's one billion Roman Catholics spent several days in Jerusalem, paying his respects at the Western Wall and the Yad Vashem Holocaust Memorial. Less than a month later, the leader of more than one billion communist Chinese followed a similar route.

It wasn't, of course, always this way. Back in the not-so-distant days when Israel was a pariah state shunned by much of the international community, visits by world heavyweights were much less common.

Whereas 15 years ago an official visit by the leader of a mid-level power like Canada would have commanded serious attention in Israel, today it is so commonplace as to elicit more indifference than curiosity.

The Foreign Ministry, responsible not only for ties with countries abroad but also for hosting their leaders in Israel, is most attuned to the sea change in Israel's stature. Its protocol department is now overworked, arranging the countless details (including putting up the right flags) for the growing number of official visits by foreign diplomats.

The collapse of the Soviet Union and its communist bloc, the launching of the Middle East peace process and Israel's increasingly exalted and sought-after high-tech and military prowess have left the Jewish state far less isolated than in the past.

Jerusalem now has diplomatic relations with more than 160 countries, up more than a quarter since 1990 and today is a serious player on the world stage, one with whom more and more countries want official ties and economic dealings.

These days, it's hard to keep up with the incessant flow of foreign leaders coming to Israel. Since last fall, the presidents, prime ministers, or foreign ministers from the United States, Canada, Japan, India, China, Britain, France, Germany, Italy, Holland, Belgium, Poland, Portugal, Sweden, Finland, Romania, Cyprus, Greece, Georgia, Moldavia, Ukraine, Armenia, Bulgaria, Slovakia, Australia, Mexico and Jordan have paid official visits to Israel, and that's only a partial list.

In addition, during the same period, the former presidents of Russia and South Africa, Boris Yeltsin, Mikhail Gorbachev and Nelson Mandela made high-profiled stops in Israel.

Some make the journey due to a long-standing friendship; some due to recent bilateral ties; some feel a visit to Israel will help them improve their image in Washington, convinced that American Jews wield near-magical power over the U.S. government.

Whatever the reason, all this diplomatic activity is a boon for Israel even if it means more headaches for those of us living in Jerusalem.

Trail of broken promises

Don't worry … we share your concern and we will prevent the proliferation of missiles and weapons of mass destruction.

This is the message that Israel has heard from the international community for over a decade, first regarding Saddam Hussein, and then with respect to the radical Islamic regime in Iran. These promises turned out to be empty – cheques written without any backing.

Gerald Steinberg in Jerusalem

For almost ten years, the liberal democracies of the world, including the United States and Canada, have been unwilling or incapable of enforcing UN resolutions on Iraq.

When the UN Special Commission (UNSCOM) began to find Saddam Hussein's hidden biological, chemical, and nuclear weapons' materials and facilities, it was disbanded. Last year, a far weaker organization was created, ostensibly to continue to search for these weapons, but it will probably never begin its work.

Meanwhile, the sanctions designed to limit the resources available to Iraq for developing weapons of mass destruction are crumbling. In short, Saddam is back in business, and the "international community" has failed, again.

Similarly, Iran's successful test of a long-range missile also shows the dangers of relying on global arms-control treaties and international agreements to protect vital national interests.

In the 1980s, the United States led a number of other countries in creating the Missile Technology Control Regime (MTCR), designed to prevent the spread of long-range ballistic missiles around the world. The participants in the MTCR were supposed to work together to prevent this proliferation, and key suppliers, such as Russia and, to a limited degree, also China, were brought into the inner circle, but all the activity was on paper and in press conferences.

In the Middle East, the MTCR has been a major failure. Egypt, Syria, Iraq, and now Iran have all succeeded in developing advanced missiles based on imported technology and expertise. Russia, which receives billions of dollars annually in assistance from the West, and still pretends to play the role of a major power, has acted with a total lack of responsibility, providing missile technology and thousands of experts to Iran.

The highly publicized commissions headed by U.S. Vice-President Albert Gore and the long string of Russian prime ministers made numerous proclamations on ending this flow of dangerous exports, but nothing changed.

Meanwhile, Washington has given up the pretence of sanctions. Russia continues to participate in the international space station, and limits placed on Russian commercial space launches are being lifted. In addition, the United States and other countries continue "dialogues" with North Korea, while missiles and components are sent to Iran, Syria, and Egypt.

For its part, Europe has followed a strategy they call "constructive dialogue" (originally a "critical dialogue," but any hint of criticism was soon dropped).

In practice, this means that France, Germany, Italy and Britain continue to do business and make money in Iran, while paying lip service to the goals of non-proliferation. Even though parts of Europe are now within the range of Iranian missiles, the threat that these weapons pose is studiously ignored. The Europeans are banking on the hope that the "reformist" groups in Iran will eventually triumph, even though at this stage, this is little more than wishful thinking.

In the meantime, President Khatami and his supporters have had no impact on the Iranian military program. The next stop on the Iranian track is the development of nuclear weapons, and billions of dollars are being poured into this project, based primarily on Russian assistance.

As in the case of missiles, the global Nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty (NPT) has not blocked Iranian access to this technology, and may, as in the case of Iraq, have provided the cover of legitimacy for acquiring nuclear know-how.

This trail of broken promises should give Israel pause when considering the role of the United States and the international community as "guarantors" of Israeli security in any agreement reached with the Palestinians.

Allies are all well and good, but the key lesson from 3,000 years of Jewish history is the importance of self-reliance.

The Kirshner File

Sharansky's career in Israeli politics

Before he threw his hat into the ring to contest the 1996 election as leader of the Israel B'Aliyah party, friends warned Natan Sharansky, the former Soviet dissident, that politics in Israel could be a dirty, demeaning business that might tarnish his lustre as a moral force.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

When he arrived in Israel in the winter of 1986, after having literally walked to freedom across the Glienicke Bridge in Potsdam, Sharansky was regarded as a Jewish hero. And because he probably realized that politics in Israel can be brutal and diminishing, he resisted entreaties from the two major political blocs, Labour and Likud, to join them and run for a seat in the Knesset.

For close to 10 years, Sharansky concentrated his attention on improving the lot of his fellow Soviet immigrants, one million of whom have arrived in Israel in the past three decades. But when he realized that their absorption problems were not being attended to properly, he took the plunge and became a politician himself.

A kingmaker after his party won seven parliamentary seats (which has since been reduced to four), Sharansky joined Benjamin Netanyahu's right-wing government as minister of industry and trade. It was a sobering experience. Disillusioned by Netanyahu's broken promises concerning Soviet immigrants and disgusted by his arrogant, condescending style, he considered resigning. Indeed, at one juncture, he declared, "We already have one leg out of the coalition."

Prior to his convincing victory in the 1999 election, Ehud Barak courted Sharansky, knowing full well that he commanded the allegiance of a constituency which played a pivotal role in the 1992 and 1996 elections. A conservative, he entered Barak's centrist government last July after refusing to publicly endorse Netanyahu for prime minister.

Earlier this month, a year and two days after taking his place in Barak's cabinet, Sharansky resigned, his relatively brief career in Israeli politics coming to an inglorious close, at least for the moment. His resignation, which had been widely expected, triggered the subsequent defections of two other unreliable right-wing coalition partners opposed to massive territorial compromise, Shas and the National Religious Party. At the end of a tumultuous day, Barak's shaky regime had imploded, and he was left with a minority government whose longevity is very much open to question.

Sharansky bolted because he was no longer in tune with Barak. He disagreed with his willingness to make sweeping concessions to the Palestinians on the road toward a permanent status agreement, the deadline of which is Sept. 13. In a leak to the media in May, Sharansky claimed that Barak would cede as much as 95 percent of the West Bank and relinquish Arab neighbourhoods in eastern Jerusalem as well. Sharansky reportedly believes that Israel should reach an agreement with the Palestinians on the basis of the Allon plan, giving up, at a maximum, three-quarters of the West Bank, but only on condition that they uphold their end of the bargain and declare a formal end to their conflict with Israel.

Barak's secretive management style was also a factor in Sharansky's decision to leave. In common with other ministers, he often complained that Barak left him in the dark about his tactics and strategy. "I wasn't trained to be a spy in Russia, but here I've had to put together an international intelligence network to find out what my prime minister is doing," he told an interviewer recently.

For Sharansky, the last straw was Barak's refusal to tell him in advance what his "red lines" would be at the Camp David summit with Bill Clinton and Yasser Arafat. Besides, Sharansky was skeptical about the idea of a summit now. The Palestinians were inflexible on key issues ranging from final borders to the status of Jerusalem, and they had not fully complied with the terms of the Oslo accords, Sharansky argued. Of course, Sharansky blithely ignored the fact that Israel was not in full compliance with Oslo either.

Sharansky, too, was upset by Barak's disregard of his oft-repeated suggestion for a national unity government, which, in his opinion, could "uphold the principles that are crucial to us at this historic time."

The truth of the matter is that Sharansky and Barak were on a collision course almost from the beginning of their association. Deeply concerned about his intentions toward the Palestinians, he defied Barak twice in recent weeks. In June, he supported a preliminary bill for early elections, and in July, he backed a motion of non-confidence in his government. By doing so, Sharansky squarely aligned himself with the nationalist-religious camp.

Sharansky adopted a particularly hard line on Jerusalem. He annoyed Barak by resisting a cabinet decision to transfer three Arab villages on the outskirts of Jerusalem to full Palestinian control. Sharansky claimed that such a redeployment would jeopardize Israel's grip on Jerusalem. Sharansky's views on Jerusalem have been consistent. When he served under Netanyahu, he urged him to press ahead with the Har Choma residential neighbourhood in eastern Jerusalem, the construction of which galvanized the Palestinians to pull out of the peace process for about nine months.

Natan Sharansky

Sharansky was similarly hawkish on Israeli withdrawals from the West Bank. In league with Shas and the National Religious Party, he voted against a cabinet decision in March to relinquish a further 6.1 percent of the West Bank to the Palestinian Authority (which is currently in partial or total control of approximately 40 percent of the West Bank).

In September 1999, following the signing of the Sharm al Sheikh pact, he abstained when Israel decided on a seven percent withdrawal. As a member of Netanyahu's inner "kitchen cabinet," he voted for the 1997 Hebron accord, but abstained on the 1998 Wye agreement.

Sharansky, generally, has been cool to turning over territory to the Palestinians. He believes that the Oslo process is "fundamentally flawed" and will not "yield the historic reconciliation for which its proponents hoped."

A keen exponent of Netanyahu's "reciprocity" principle, he thinks that the Oslo accords lack a direct mechanism for holding the Palestinians accountable to their obligations under its provisions.

And he is of the opinion that territorial concessions should be linked to the full democratization of the Palestinian Authority. Sharansky applied this principle to Israel's recent negotiations with Syria over the Golan Heights. Last December, he threatened to pull his party out of Barak's government if he consented to return the Golan to Syria. Several months later, he backed a Knesset bill that would have made it harder for Barak to win a referendum on a Golan withdrawal.

Like most immigrants from the former Soviet Union, he is suspicious of totalitarian regimes and doubts whether they are capable of honouring written agreements. As he has said, the depth of an Israeli pullout from the West Bank and the Golan should equal the depth of democratization in the Palestine Authority and Syria. It is a nice but impractical thesis. Taken to its logical conclusion, Sharansky's theory would perpetuate Israel's occupation and thus make peace unattainable. And it's worth remembering that if Sharansky's criteria had been applied to previous diplomatic initiatives, Israel could not have possibly signed peace treaties with either Egypt in 1979 or with Jordan in 1995.

In domestic affairs, Sharansky has compiled a decidedly mixed record. Under Netanyahu, he did not oppose a conversion bill which effectively delegitimized Reform and Conservative Jews in the Diaspora. During the Bar-On scandal, he promised to step down if "only 10 percent" of the charges against Netanyahu were proven to be true. The attorney general ruled that the bulk of the accusations were indeed correct, yet Sharansky stayed on.

As interior minister, he re-recognized consular marriages and thus made it possible for some mixed race couples, the majority Russian, to marry without going abroad. And he banned DNA tests designed to prove the Jewish kinship of new immigrants.

Critics have charged that Sharansky, a tireless human rights campaigner in the Soviet Union, has not spoken out in cases of alleged torture and abuse of Palestinian prisoners. But in an unmistakable gesture to the Palestinian community, he reversed a policy that had stripped Palestinians of their residency rights in Jerusalem after they had not lived in the city for more than seven years.

His ministry, however, declined to reinstate the Israeli citizenship of about 1,000 Muslim women who had married Palestinians and moved to the territories. Last year, Supreme Court President Aharon Barak speculated whether the ministry would have issued similar guidelines had the case involved Jewish women who had settled in California with their husbands.

URGENT APPEAL TO HELP A FELLOW JEW BLINDED FOLLOWING A VICIOUS ATTACK

Mr. Vizel, father of 17 children, was the victim of a vicious, senseless, anti-semitic attack in New York, that left him with severe head injuries and totally blind. As a result of the attack, Mr. Vizel is no longer able to provide for his family who now have the daunting responsibility of caring for their permanently disabled father.

No one should ever know the tragedy and suffering the Vizel family has endured and continues to endure. This once self-sufficient family has been reduced to relying on the generosity of their Jewish brethren for a meagre existence.

We ask everyone to help them in whatever way possible. There can hardly be a greater or more worthy Charitable donation.

Sincerely,
Toronto Rabbis: Amrom Assayag, Yeshua Fuhrer, Yitzchok Kirzner, Moshe M. Lowy, Shlome E. Miller, Duvid Pam, Baruch Taub & Dr. Allan Seidenfeld (campaign chairman) and Moshe Zolty.

Music plays to audience of one

By ELLIOTT MALAMET

JEWISH EDUCATION
The Next Generation

Lorenzo's pointed remark in The Merchant of Venice, "Mark the music," would receive submissive assent from almost every child I teach.

Plugged in to a multi-billion-dollar machine of constant tapes, videos, CDs and Internet pirated music, our children read to music, run to it, study to it, play computer games with it and understand life through it.

Judaism is intricately concerned with definition, and thus the word "music" requires close scrutiny. Those who advocate for Gershwin or Brahms will find that their passion gains little sympathy from those between the ages of 10 and 20. Classical music, as Allan Bloom once wrote, "is dead among the young. It is a special taste, like Greek language or pre-Columbian archeology, not a common culture of reciprocal communication and psychological shorthand."

Hip hop, rap, prepubescent fantasy music (Britney Spears, 'N Sync), and rock and roll are some of the most powerful cultural influences a child of this generation will know for many years.

What are the consequences of the current phase of that which Shakespeare once called a "concord of sweet sounds"? The answers to this tend to be polarized and depend on whether one is alarmist or prone to passing it off as another transitory pursuit.

Those concerned about the inundation of lyrics that invoke premature sexuality and celebrate drug use raise the spectacle of the decline of civilization with the advent of every mindless Top Forty hit. Those who would like to believe that everything in culture is harmless outside of serial killers and high taxes will once again dismiss all critiques of music's influence on the young as the grouchy residue of aging.

The truth, as always, is more subtle. Whether it's Johnny Rotten (Sex Pistols) screaming, "We don't care," more than 20 years ago, or Billy Corgan (Smashing Pumpkins) sardonically scowling, "God is empty, just like me," rock music has always provided a shallow yet convenient outlet for teen frustration. And frankly that may not be a bad thing after all; the passion that can be found in certain rock anthems could be translated into education.

Eventually even Johnny Rotten grew up (and made a lot of money, but that's another story). Our children will grow up too, and our faith in their better selves and our memories of our own rebellions will serve us in good stead.

The deeper issue is not what's in the words but the words that are no longer spoken. Everywhere one travels, the loss of a personal immediacy between human beings is omnipresent: subways filled with human beings disguised as walkmans; neigbourhoods where children a block apart chat on the computer rather than meet face to face.

Technology cannot replace the difficult and demanding task of learning to build a spiritual self. Music was once a means of directing the deepest passions of the soul. Now it has become a way of cutting the cords to the outside world, a tune that increasingly plays to an audience of one.

Impressive, moving chronicle

The Human Stain*, by Philip Roth, (Houghton Mifflin Company).

Books
Bernard Baskin

In the portentous summer of 1998, while the United States is reacting with prurient fascination to the Bill Clinton-Monica Lewinsky soap opera, another drama is unfolding on the discreet campus of New England's Athena College.

One day, Coleman Silk, a respected Jewish professor of classics and dean of the faculty, casually asks about two absent students: "Does anyone know these people? Do they exist or are they spooks?"

The word "spooks" proves to be his undoing. The students turn out to be black and the bewildered Silk is accused of racism and misogyny. In a time of fear and political correctness his career and reputation are soon shattered.

Silk's misery is compounded when his wife dies of the resulting emotional trauma and he becomes estranged from his children. Seeking comfort and solace, the 71-year-old professor flees to the arms of 34-year-old Faunia Farley. She seems an unlikely partner for the genteel and intellectual academic.

A victim many times over, she had been molested in childhood by her stepfather and abused in adulthood by her crazed Vietnam veteran ex-husband. Her two children have died in a tragic apartment fire. Unschooled, semiliterate – but strong willed, resilient and realistic – she works as a part-time janitor at the college.

Avenging professors – especially a vindictive feminist colleague – and disturbed townspeople make him the butt of ridicule and opprobrium.

But Silk has an even more serious problem. He was born and reared as a light-skinned son of an African-American family. At 27 he was able to cut himself loose from family ties and pass as a white, olive-complexioned Jew. This secret has been kept for 50 years from his wife, four children – and everyone.

The irony, of course, is that he is unable to defend himself against the accusation of racism. The long section that deals with his youth and upbringing is a convincing introduction to his character and motivations.

The entire moving chronicle is told with impressive detail and slowly unravelled by Nathan Zuckerman, the author's alter ego who figures prominently in many of his novels. The plot seems overly contrived, but the reader who is willing to suspend disbelief will be moved by a powerful and disturbing series of events.

Silk's pseudo Jewish identity is an important element in the story, but Roth insisted in a recent interview that Silk's choice "has nothing to do with the ethical, spiritual, theological or historical aspects of Judaism." At his father's funeral, Mark recites the Kaddish. When he finished he was overcome by hysteria. His "wild sound of lamentation, older even than the prayer he'd uttered, rose in intensity until, when he saw his sister rushing toward him with arms outstretched, he turned to her his contorted Silk face, and in sheer childlike astonishment cried, 'We're never going to see him again!'"

The Human Stain, is the third in a trilogy of novels that explore the post-war American scene; the acclaimed, American Pastoral and the earlier depiction of the McCarthy era, I Married a Communist. Roth, at the height of his powers, has been rightly described as a "master chronicler of the American twentieth century."

Enjoy ketubot on the Net

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

If you are in the market for a ketubah, you would have to travel through dozens of homes and even more art galleries to find the range of ketubot that you can view on your computer's desktop.

And even if you're not getting married, you still can enjoy one of Judaism's most interesting and beautiful legal documents. Today, an online guided tour.

According to the Ohr Somayach site, this contract is ordained by mishnaic law (circa 170 CE) and according to some authorities dates back to biblical times. The ketubah, written in Aramaic, details the husband's obligations to his wife: food, clothing, dwelling and pleasure. It also creates a lien on all his property to pay her a sum of money and support should he divorce her or predecease her [http://www.ohr.org.il/judaism/articles/wedding. htm].

The traditional ketubah is written in Aramaic, the language of the Babylonian Jews. You can find an English translation at the Information Page on Jewish Family Law [http://users.aol.com/agunah/family.htm]. At the e-judaica Web site, you'll find an explanation of the ketubah variations available [http://store.yahoo.com/ejudaica/huppaketubah.html]. For example, the Conservative ketubah includes the Lieberman Clause, which was added to allow either the man or the woman to initiate a divorce. The Web site points out that Orthodox rabbis do not recognize the Lieberman Clause and that you should check with your rabbi before selecting your text.

Although this is essentially a document, the adornment of Ketubot is a cherished tradition. As Yale University's Beinecke Rare Book and Manuscript Library eloquently puts it: "These decorations transform the ketubah from a dry legal document into a work of art and a window into the world and culture of the Jewish communities that produced them." [http:// www.library.yale.edu/exhibition/judaica/brbml.html].

There are many Internet sites where you can browse (and even order) contemporary ketubot, such as The Complete Jewish Wedding [http://www.ketubahs.com], The Ketubah Collection [http://www.judaiconnection.com/] and Ketubah Ketubah [http://www.ketubah.com/]. You'll find a huge selection of ketubot with names like Arch of Yemen, Flowers of Paradise, Shalom Bayit and even the Eco Ketubah. And if you prefer something a bit more ancient, you can take a look at some of the treasures held by the Library of Congress [http://www.us-israel.org/jsource/loc/Ketuboth1.html].

No matter how beautiful your ketubah is – or how long you have been married – Anita Diamant says don't just admire your ketubah, read it regularly [http://www.jewishfamily.com/families/former_columnists/displayfamily.php?text=anita_diamant/my_ketubah.txt]. Diamant quotes the Baal Shem Tov, the 18th-century founder of Chassidism who "advised couples to re-read their ketubah whenever they were fighting. It would remind them, he said, of how they felt as brides and grooms, hopeful, smitten, surrounded by good wishes."

But Diamant says it shouldn't take a fight to get couples to re-read their ketubah. "It ought to be one of those health and safety habits, like checking your smoke detector when you change the clocks for daylight savings. Likewise, on every wedding anniversary, Jewish couples should sit down and read the contract they signed with stars in their eyes… Even the most exquisite ketubah is never simply a work of art. A ketubah always signifies the Jewishness of a love story, a marriage, a home, a family, a past and a future."

A Zayde's Poem For His Granddaughter

Guest Voice

I held you closely in my arms,
And gazed upon your tiny form,
All swathed in delicate cloth,
I kissed you softly and lost my heart,
so sweet, so precious,
My Lior, my light.

A week has gone and here you are,
More beautiful with each passing day,
You are God's miracle for all to love,
And you are mine for my length of days,
My Lior, my light.

What will be five years from now,
When you take my hand in yours,
Oh Zayde, Zayde, buy me this,
What greater treasure can there be
than my child like you,
My Lior, my light.

In God's good graces should I be,
To witness your day on the Bimah and pray,
The joyous tears of your bat mitzvah day,
What greater treasure can there be,
My Lior, my light.

Your sweet sixteen, should I stay,
I want to cherish your youth each day,
And see the boys who will vie for your heart,
Your teasing ways, so sweet and fun,
My Lior, my light.

And when you mature into womanhood,
And are about to wed on that magical day,
My eyes may not witness what I wish to see,
Fret not my darling for I will be in your heart,
My Lior, my light.

But I'm here still now my einicle zeese,
To ponder all about your life to be,
So take my hand your Zayde's love,
And may all your life be filled with naches
and delight,
My precious, my heart, my Lior, my light.

Insured Annuities - Lifetime Guarantees of 10% Plus

In today's environment of low interest rates and volatile stock markets, many investors seek more attractive and less stressful investments.

If you are at retirement age and trying to maximize spendable income from non-RRSP savings, insured annuities provide the best of both worlds - significantly higher after-tax income for life and the capital guaranteed tax-free to your estate. The older you are, the higher the yield on your investment.

Consider the following example, which compares the investment of $200,000 in a GIC at 6% with an insured annuity, for a man aged 75.

GIC versus Insured Annuity

	GIC	Insured Annuity
Capital	200,000	200,000
Annual Income	12,000	26,300
Taxable Income	12,000	6,600
Tax (50%)	6,000	3,300
After Tax Income	6,000	23,000
Insurance Cost	NIL	11,000
Spendable Income	6,000	12,000
Gross Equivalent Yield	6%	12%
Estate Value	200,000	200,000
Subject to Probate	YES	NO
Guaranteed Period	5 YEARS	LIFE

Effective improved yield on investment = 100%

Rebuilding a shtetl: Yaffa Eliach's grandiose plan

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Prof. Yaffa Eliach's latest project is more ambitious than anything she's done before, but underlying it is a simple approach to teaching the lessons of the Holocaust.

"I can't understand," says one of the world's foremost Holocaust scholars, "why our focus has been on death and destruction, and not life."

Eliach, creator of the Tower of Life, a mesmerizing photo exhibit in the U.S. Holocaust Memorial Museum in Washington, believes that to defeat Hitler, it's as important to teach about Jewish living as it is to teach about Jews who have died – to show the world the vitality, the throb, the beauty of prewar Jewish life in Europe. Acting on that obligation, she has undertaken to rebuild a vanished past – literally.

Working with the municipality of Rishon LeZion in Israel and an array of engineers, architects and historians, Eliach is spearheading her dream of building a scale replica of Eishyshok, the 900-year-old Lithuanian shtetl where she was born and raised, and most of whose Jewish residents were slaughtered by Nazi troops in 1941.

Prof. Yaffa Eliach

To be located on 121 acres in southwest Rishon LeZion, Israel's fourth largest city, the full-size restoration will include synagogues, yeshivot, stables, homes, cobblestone streets, restaurants, even a castle – all a permanent physical recreation of a lost world. As Eliach notes, this won't be for those who want to forget, but for those who want to remember.

"Every place has restored its past. The Jewish people haven't," said Eliach, who was in town recently to deliver the Ruth Kelman Memorial Lecture at Beth Jacob Synagogue and to drum up support for her Shtetl Foundation, which aims to raise $50 million worldwide for the project (the Israeli government has promised to match all funds raised, meaning the entire restoration will cost around $100 million.)

"Restoring life is the most important element in documenting history. When this is complete, I will be able to tell my children and 13 grandchildren that Hitler lost, and we won," she said.

Groundbreaking is slated for next spring; completion in five or six years.

Eliach envisions a full, interactive shtetl experience, a yiddishe version of Black Creek Pioneer Village, the Toronto colonial attraction where employees dress in period costumes and go about chores of yore.

In the "new" Eishyshok, once home to 3,500 Jews and 500 non-Jews, visitors, who will pay an entrance fee, will be able to study at the yeshiva; partake in hearty fare at the local eatery (complete with authentic menus); shop in the central marketplace; see Yiddish theatre; visit the cemetery; stay in a hotel; even get married in the style of the time in a torch-lit procession on Friday afternoon, accompanied by klezmer music.

Children will even be able to take classes at the local cheder.

"It will bring back wonderful memories," says Eliach; evocations, she says, not of victims or quaint characters from Fiddler on the Roof, but of real people; real sights, sounds and smells of how we once lived, played and worked.

She's hoping that thousands of people will come, including youths who routinely visit the sites of European death camps.

Eliach says the project is generating huge interest in Israel. Already, local artists and actors have expressed interest in working in the shtetl. Rabbis want to be a part of it too.

Even the woods that surrounded Eishyshok will be recreated, as will a river that flowed through the town. A small bridge over the river is where the rabbi blessed people who were departing for Palestine, Eliach remembers.

"I'm the only person in the world who has plans to build wooden synagogues," laughs Eliach about her blueprints of the shtetl's two main shuls. On a more sombre note, she plans to recreate every last tombstone that was in the Jewish cemetery.

Eliach, who has taught at Brooklyn College for over 20 years and assembled Hasidic Tales of the Holocaust, got the idea for her monumental project following completion of her latest book, There Once Was a World: A 900-Year Chronicle of the Shtetl of Eishyshok, an 800-page tribute detailing every aspect of life, Jewish holidays, people and places.

Her connection with Eishyshok is deep: her family, the Sonensohns, were among the first to settle the town in 1065.

It all ended in the autumn of 1941, when, in the course of two days, the town's Jews were rounded up and machine-gunned into mass graves. Eliach's father was able to get the family into hiding.

In 1944, following the area's liberation by Soviet troops, Eliach, then just six years old, witnessed her mother and baby brother being shot to death by members of the Polish Home Army.

In all, just 29 Jews from Eishyshok survived the war.

Eliach spent two decades tracking down thousands of photographs of the town for the Tower of Life. Now, she's scouring municipal records for plans, blueprints and pictures of buildings, and she's talking to fellow survivors – anything that will bring more authenticity to the replica.

Today, Eishyshok, near the border with Belarus, is a hard-scrabble place of 3,000 souls, many of them Gypsies. One synagogue was turned into a sports complex and is now abandoned. Another was simply levelled. The beit midrash is now a cinema. A school stands on the site of the old cemetery. There are no Jews left, and every effort has been made to expunge from memories that Jews ever lived there.

"The locals say the buildings never belonged to Jews," says Eliach. "There is no mention of Jews anywhere."

Thus all the more reason to recreate it. "In a sense," she explains, "we are closing the door to a vanished past so that we can have a living, breathing town."

German slave deal to benefit many Canadians

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — "My payment," recalls Michael Rosenberg of his hellish years as a slave labourer for the Nazis, "was that I got to survive until the next day."

Rosenberg, now 74, spent three years as a slave in four different concentration camps in Nazi-occupied Poland, beginning in 1940. From sunup to sunset, with no rest, he helped build barracks, then smashed rocks in a stone quarry, and toiled at two different munitions factories. Rations consisted of ersatz coffee and a piece of bread for breakfast, and watery turnip soup for lunch and supper.

Sometimes, Rosenberg, like the other slaves, would stash some of the bread from breakfast to eat later.

For his troubles, the teenaged Rosenberg had most of his teeth knocked out by an SS guard.

"The days were endless," he remembers.

In 1943, he escaped a transport to Auschwitz and spent the rest of the war using false papers to live as a Catholic.

Now, like an estimated 170,000 Jewish former slave labourers around the world, Rosenberg, the Toronto-based president of Jewish Holocaust Survivors of Canada, is eligible to apply for compensation from the $7.1 billion (Cdn.) deal signed this month by Germany and German industries.

The deal "closes one of the last open chapters of the Nazi past," German Chancellor Gerhard Schroeder said. "We are setting down a durable marker of historic and moral responsibility."

The historic agreement came at the end of two years of wrenching negotiations between German government officials, representatives of seven nations, including Israel, and the Conference on Jewish Material Claims Against Germany. The money will compensate an estimated one million former forced and slave labourers around the world – most of them non-Jews – including some 30,000 in Canada.

Most forced labourers were non-Jews – local civilians, mostly in eastern Europe, who were rounded up to work on farms and infrastructure. The majority of slaves were Jews sent to work and often to death, in the more extreme conditions of concentration camps or comparable places.

It's estimated that 15,000 Jews in Canada are eligible for compensation. Rosenberg and other Jewish former slaves will be entitled to about $10,600 each.

The pay-out "is way too late," Rosenberg says. "And there's no way to compensate us for our losses anyway." On the other hand, "it will help a lot of needy survivors in Canada."

While some survivors have greeted the announcement of the deal as more important symbolically than financially, Rosenberg feels otherwise: "No matter what the Germans do, they cannot cleanse themselves of what they did."

Canadian Jewish Congress president Moshe Ronen agreed that it is "impossible to quantify the suffering of [former] labourers," but called the deal "a measure of justice."

Ronen told The CJN from New York, where he was attending the annual meeting of the Jewish Claim Conference's board, that he would have liked to see more money available.

The final amount – $5 billion (US) – is more than the $3.3 billion the German government and industries offered last year, but far below the $10 billion some lawyers representing former labourers were demanding.

But, "this isn't about money," Ronen said. "It's about the acceptance of moral responsibility."

As for the distribution of the money, he said ads will appear in Jewish and general media in the next 60 days advising survivors on how to apply. All claims will be processed by the Claims Conference, a task that will be made easier given that most applicants will already be in computer databases because of past compensation and restitution payments, Ronen added.

He said it is hoped that all funds will be distributed within two years, starting later this year.

However, the final settlement has been delayed by a few weeks because as part of the deal, German industries are seeking the dismissal of 55 class action lawsuits brought by former labourers in the United States.

More than 3,000 German companies have pledged to raise half of the $7.1 billion, with the other half to come from the German government.

Krupp, IG-Farben, Siemens, Bayer and Volkswagen are among dozens of German firms known to have used forced labour during World War II, but Ronen said a list of companies that will contribute to the deal has not been made public yet.

The deal will also set aside $35 million for "other wrongs," including compensating victims of medical experiments; $245 million for insurance claims that cannot be processed under separate negotiations for war-era claims; and $70 million to supplement payouts under the Swiss humanitarian fund, which allocated $170 million – $2.5 million to Canada – specifically for needy survivors. Even though that fund has been distributed, many late claims were received.

Ronen said claimants must have been alive as of Feb. 16, 1999, the day the framework for negotiations was established, in order to qualify. Heirs of survivors will also be eligible to file claims.

Ronen said the Claims Conference will next focus on Austria, which has been very slow in talks to compensate former slaves. "Basically, they have lied to us for the past six months," Ronen said of the Austrians. "They have given us an empty bag and ignored their moral responsibility."

New Era For Jewish Women

Dodi Weill is the new Chair of a UJA FEDERATION division representing Toronto's 100,000 Jewish women.

Weill was recently installed as the first Chair of Women's Campaign & Advocacy, an entity resulting from the merger of the UJA FEDERATION Women's Campaign and Jewish Women's Federation (JWF). She took over from predecessors Carole Sterling, who headed the Women's Campaign last year, and Janice Langer, past president, JWF.

"I feel truly honoured to stand here before you as the first Chair of the combined Women's Campaign & Advocacy," said Weill. "I'm extremely excited about the prospects that lie ahead. It will be a new chapter in the long, proud tradition of communal involvement by Jewish women."

Weill, who was raised in a small Jewish community outside of Manchester, England, appreciates Toronto's sizable and growing Jewish population – with the infrastructure to support it. "Where I grew up, there was only one synagogue, one kosher butcher and one kosher baker. We knew who we were because of the closeness of our community, and because the non-Jews wouldn't let us forget."

Now, Weill, along with Vice-Chair Lesley Binstock Offman and the rest of the Women's Campaign & Advocacy executive, hope to answer the needs resulting from our community's rapid growth as they gear up for Campaign 2001 – The Campaign For Our Children.

"We would like to support, for example, projects to aid immigrant youth in Toronto," said Weill. "Why shouldn't all children have the opportunity to feel connected?"

Women's Campaign & Advocacy, which raises more than $4 million yearly for the UJA FEDERATION Annual Campaign, also operates many educational, outreach and advocacy programs, including:

- Timeless Treasures, a learning program that deals with spiritual issues; and inspiring workshops on a range of topics from financial empowerment to Jewish identity;
- Bus missions to various UJA FEDERATION funded agencies to see how donor gifts change lives;
- Partnerships with diverse organizations such as The Downtown Women's Network, The Young Mother's Network, local neighbourhood groups and a network for women from the former Soviet Union;
- Women's Abuse programs that raise awareness about the plight of abused women and children exposed to violence;
- A Presidents Council representing over 50 Jewish women's organizations in Toronto.

Joining Weill and Binstock Offman on the executive are: Tammy Anklewicz, Honey Carr, Lynn Catzman, Clara Cooper, Ruth Ekstein, Helen Finder-Guttman, Judith Finer-Freedman, Frances Goldstein, Susan Gudofsky, Alison Himel, Sarena Koschitzky, Miri Schneiderman, Joan Shapero, Helen Silverstein and Fran Sonshine.

Helping Young Immigrants

Toronto's young Jewish newcomers are benefiting from new community programs designed specifically to meet their needs, thanks to a partnership between UJA FEDERATION and a group of Russian Jewish women.

The Russian Jewish Initiative, a community group formed out of concern for Toronto's Russian Jewish youth after the tragic death of Matti Baranovski, recently held an art auction and concert, in co-operation with UJA FEDERATION, which raised $10,000 for immigrant youth programs.

"We need more programs for newcomers to the community," said Elena Aleinikov, co-chair of the Russian Jewish Initiative with Vicki Frenkel. "The youth are the future generation – we want to reach out to them and make them feel welcome."

Proceeds from the event – which featured works by local Russian artists, musicians, singers and dancers – will help create, among other projects, after-school programs for young immigrants.

Two young performers won the hearts of audience members at the event, which raised $10,000 for immigrant youth programs.

"The upcoming annual UJA FEDERATION campaign – The Campaign For Our Children – centres on young people, and immigrant youth is one of the groups we want to help," says organization president Alan Sandler.

New summer programs for Russian youth in the Bathurst-Finch neighbourhood are already in place, based on the recommendations of a UJA FEDERATION task force report.

The initiatives, which include leadership development wilderness programs for 12- to 16-year-olds at Albion Park and a sports camp for children at Fisherville Junior High, are being co-ordinated by Jewish Immigrant Aid Service (JIAS). A youth worker who was hired to address specific needs of young people in the Russian Jewish community recently held a lunch program with children at the Fisherville camp.

"The kids talked about feeling lonely and isolated – and how it made them feel good that someone thought they were special enough to do something for them," says Mila Voihanski, director of immigrant services for JIAS. "Parents in the area are very happy that the Jewish community hasn't forgotten about them."

Other projects in the works will be located at a drop-in centre and an employment centre.

The Campaign For Our Children

jewish Toronto

Ron Frisch and Ed Sonshine are heading up UJA FEDERATION's Campaign 2001, a dramatic initiative to meet the urgent needs of young people in our rapidly growing community.

The Campaign For Our Children, which will officially launch on August 30, 2000, hopes to raise $45 million – $4 million more than last year.

"The needs of our community continue to grow," says Sonshine. "It is our responsibility to care about and help every Jewish child in Toronto – or anywhere else in the world. All our children deserve to live free from poverty, domestic violence and anti-Semitism."

Sonshine, president and CEO of RioCan Real Estate, took on the responsibility of the campaign to set an example for his children. "I always believed that you should show kids, rather than tell them, how to be charitable and give back to the community."

Frisch, CEO of pharmaceutical distributor Kohl & Frisch Ltd., is also motivated by his children. "I want them to know there is a bigger world out there and that we have a responsibility to each other."

Campaign Vice-Chairs Judy Engel and Harry Krakowsy will join forces with Frisch and Sonshine, who co-chaired UJA FEDERATION'S major gifts campaign last year.

Increased contributions from The Campaign For Our Children will be designated for three key funding initiatives:

- $1.4 million to help lift children from poverty, domestic violence and the isolation of being newcomers to Toronto.
- $2.1 million to help bring our kids closer to Judaism, through formal Jewish education and powerful, informal Jewish experiences such as Birthright Israel.
- $500,000 to rescue young people from hopelessness and anti-Semitism in the former Soviet Union.

"We need to provide additional financial assistance to thousands of Jewish families living below the poverty line," says Gordon Wolfe, executive director of Jewish Family & Child Service, a UJA FEDERATION beneficiary agency. "There are parents struggling to pay rent and feed their kids, with very little – if anything – left over for the necessities of life."

"I want my children to know there is a bigger world out there and that we have a responsibility to each other." - Ron Frisch

Research shows that children whose families live in poverty suffer greater abuse, more health problems, drop out of school earlier and have more of a chance of drug and alcohol use.

"By providing additional dollars, UJA FEDERATION enables JF&CS to keep families together, and maintain children in their own homes while we counsel and support them," says Wolfe.

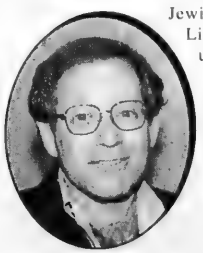
Gift increases will also allow UJA FEDERATION's Board of Jewish Education (BJE) to increase the amount of money available for tuition subsidies to parents of day school students who can't afford full fees, in addition to expanding Jewish family education programs.

"Jewish education ensures the continuation of Jewish values and a Jewish community," says Dr. Seymour Epstein, executive director of BJE. "We should be able to give all parents the opportunity to consider Jewish education for their children."

Judy Engel

Similarly, The Campaign For Our Children will make more funds available to continue vital Israel experience programs for young people, such as March of the Living and Birthright Israel. "Israel experiences are an essential component of building Jewish identity," says Glennie Lindenberg, Chair of Continuity for UJA FEDERATION.

Last year, UJA FEDERATION'S Campaign 2000 raised more than $ 41 million – a new record.



Harry Krakowsky

VIP Visit for March Participants

For the first time ever, seven Toronto teenagers met with the Prime Minister of Poland during the recent March of the Living. The teens, who walked an hour on Shabbat to get to the official residence of Prime Minister Jerzy Buzek, spoke to him for a half hour about their thoughts of the mission and Poland in general.

"We've come a long way to have the Polish prime minister meet with a group of Jewish children," says Anita Ekstein, a chaperone on the trip who was hidden and saved by a Polish family during the Holocaust.

A record 400 Canadians, including more than 100 Torontonians, participated in this year's March. The emotional pilgrimage to Polish concentration camps included a 3 km march from Auschwitz to Birkenau (left).

JRCC holds an historic evening

TORONTO — An evening of appreciation for executive donors at the Jewish Russian Community Centre (JRCC) last month was notable for more than the recognition of generous supporters.

It was, according to Igor Korenzvit, chair of the JRCC board of governors, "the first time that Russian [immigrant] and Canadian Jews got together as equals and partners."

Until now, he said, the relationship was one-sided. "It was always the Canadian Jewish community helping to serve the needs of the Russians, like finding them jobs and apartments, or making Chanukah parties."

Rabbi Yosef Zaltzman, executive director of the JRCC, called it a "sign of growth and maturity" that immigrants from the former Soviet Union can now participate in philanthropic activities with their Canadian counterparts.

The event was held at the JRCC on Rockford Road. Greetings were brought by Moshe Ronen, national president of Canadian Jewish Congress; Alan Sandler, president of UJA FEDERATION of Greater Toronto; and Councillor Mike Feldman, on behalf of Toronto Mayor Mel Lastman.

Rabbi Zaltzman and Korenzvit told The CJN that the executive donors group, chaired by Alex Shnaider, was established in September 1999 to provide financial support for JRCC projects, including The Toronto Jewish Academy Ohr Menachem, which is moving in September to new quarters on Bathurst Street in York Region.

There are now nearly 50 people in the group – about 15 people from the larger community and about 35 from the Russian community. It is hoped that they "will be the best ambassadors" in bringing in new people at this level of giving," Korenzvit said. Many others donate to the organization on a smaller basis, depending on their financial situation, he added.

It is important to get the Russians involved, Korenzvit said, because they "make up the largest single group of Jews in Ontario, 15 to 20 percent, "more than South Africans, Israelis, Sephardim."

Members of the executive donors group include Mikhail Kharlip, Mikhail Reznikov, Fred Sorkin, Korenzvit, Boris Khakhan, Gideon Orzakovski, Leonid Saltsov, Yoseph Levitan, Leonid Pekker, Val Levitan, Leonid Bravinsky, Boris Serebryany, Michael Serebrennikov, Izrail Vainberg, Michael Shats, Lew Pliamm, Maya Grad, Isaac Kanter, Boris Karlin, Marsha Karlin, Vladimir Karlin, Fred and Anya Sorkin, Michael Lublin, Moshe Lipszyc, Isaac Benitah, David Bronfman, Howard Tanenbaum, Larry Tanenbaum, Herman Grad, Herb Green, George Berger, Marty Rochwerg, Marty Goldberg and Saul Feldberg.

Secretary is school's 'ambassador'

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

If you ask Debbie Edberg what she does at Leo Baeck Day School, make sure you have a few minutes.

Spotlight

Officially, she is the receptionist/secretary, but that is only a fraction of her duties.

Debbie Edberg

Edberg, 48, started working at the school 14 years ago when it was still on Kenton Avenue. If she were to write a job description, she says, it would have to be a jack of all trades.

"I wear many hats. As the modern day school nurse, I've taken the St. John's Ambulance course, and I take care of kids when they don't feel well. I may give them their puffers, their medication, or maybe just a hug. The kids call me the Band-Aid lady; they know I'll give them one even if they don't need it.

"I get to know them, and I realize that sometimes they come to the office just because they feel like chatting; they may need a short break. When their tooth falls out, I make a fuss over them and give them an envelope with a penny inside."

She is also the sounding board for kids and parents. "I'm there for people if they need to discuss something. I know the families, I know their situation, and I never discuss anything with anyone else. I'm the first person people talk to when they call the school; I calm them down, direct them – whatever they need.

"Leo Baeck is a unique school. It is very family oriented. Parents know that when they phone the school, it is like calling a friend. They can depend on me to get a message to their children."

Edberg is the public relations ambassador, says Zita Gardner, director of Leo Baeck. "She is the person who gives out the first message… She is the first voice of the school."

Her administrative duties include typing schedules, booking school trips, helping substitute teachers orient themselves, and making sure all the classes are covered.

"The school has grown 100 percent in the last eight years, and my job has grown with it.

"It is like a second home. I find the last day very difficult, especially saying good-bye to the graduates. I've really bonded with some of them. There are always a lot of hugs and kisses."

Journalist brings Jews to Haven

By ADAM SEGAL
CJN Intern

TORONTO — When Ruth Gruber's parents and top American army brass tried to dissuade her from secretly escorting a ship full of refugees fleeing Nazi persecution, she ignored their pleas.

At that time, Gruber was the 33-year-old assistant to the former U.S. secretary of the interior, Harold Ickes. She decided the opportunity to rescue people from death was important enough to put her own life in danger.

Ruth Gruber

"They did everything to try to prevent me," recalls the sprightly 88-year-old journalist and author of 15 books, "but I just knew I had to do it."

Gruber wrote a book on her experiences called Haven, which is now being turned into the CBS mini-series Safe Haven, starring Natasha Richardson and academy-award winners Anne Bancroft and Martin Landau, currently being shot in Toronto.

The decision to ship and temporarily house 982 mostly Jewish refugees from 18 countries, to a former army base in Oswego, N.Y., came in 1944.

Until then, no major rescue operation had been carried out by the American government, even though officials in the State Department were aware Jews were being systematically murdered.

Gruber, who speaks Yiddish and German, had travelled extensively while documenting the treatment of women in communist and fascist countries and was highly respected by Ickes. She was an obvious choice to guide the group across U-boat infested waters.

On the ship, Gruber taught English to many of the refugees and gradually befriended them. They affectionately called her "Mother Ruth."

"I told them that they had to tell me what they had gone through," Gruber recalls, adding that there was a great deal of reluctance.

"Some of the men would say, 'You're a woman, what they did was so obscene [that] we can't tell you.'"

But Gruber was adamant and countered, "Forget that I'm a woman. You are the first witnesses coming to America. It is through you that America will learn the truth about these crimes."

As the survivors graphically recounted their horrific experiences, Gruber found herself weeping profusely, nearly washing out the ink on her paper with tears.

It was then, Gruber asserts, that she became a Jew.

"I really think that even though we are born Jews, there is a moment in our lives that we become Jews."

The ship arrived at Oswego's Fort Ontario on August 5, 1944. But the refugees were not free. They were not allowed to leave the camp, which in some ways resembled an internment camp with a barbed-wired topped fence outlining the facility.

Gruber lobbied the government on several occasions to improve the conditions in the camp and to let the refugees remain there for the duration of the war. She eventually helped convince the government to allow the refugees to apply for permanent resident visas.

Many of the refugees went on to professional success in the United States. Alex Marguiles, a teenager in the camp from Yugoslavia, eventually helped develop the CAT scan and the MRI. While these successes are gratifying for Gruber, at the same time she says that "it haunts me how many more we could have saved."

The 18-month drama is described by Gruber as "the defining moment of my life."

Safe Haven will feature scenes of Gruber's work as a correspondent before and after the war. The film is expected to air in February in conjunction with the release of Gruber's newly revised autobiography, Ahead of Time.

"We are all Jewish:" Ashkenazi rabbi

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — In his 40 years in Morocco, Rabbi Yehuda Leib Raskin has never been referred to as Ashkenazi.

"We are all Jewish," the Casablanca-based Chabad Lubavitch rabbi said in a recent interview.

Rabbi Raskin was in Toronto earlier this month for hiloula (yahrzeit) ceremonies in memory of the Lubavitcher Rebbe, Rabbi Menachem Mendel Schneerson. He spoke on July 3 in French at the Sephardic Kehilla Centre and the following night in Hebrew at Chabad Lubavitch Centre in Thornhill.

His message was the importance of Jewish unity, he told The CJN during a French-language interview at the centre.

The Moroccan Jewish community is comfortable within the greater Moroccan community, he said, noting that Morocco has a Jewish senator and three or four years ago had a Jewish tourism minister.

On a recent trip to Washington, Rabbi Raskin was presented to Morocco's King Mohammed VI, who succeeded his father Hassan II after the latter's death last summer. The king requested a benediction, which, the rabbi said, he provided.

Rabbi Raskin was born in Leningrad in 1933 to a Lubavitch family who studied Torah clandestinely in communist Russia. They left in 1946 for Germany, with Polish Jews who had taken refuge in Russia during the war.

In 1953, Rabbi Raskin headed to the United States, where he studied with Rabbi Schneerson.

His emissary work for the Rebbe took him to France, where he met his wife Raizel, also a Russian-born descendant of an early Lubavitch family. They married in Paris in 1959 and were sent to Morocco the following year.

Rabbi Yehuda Leib Raskin

Although Lubavitch had had a presence in Morocco for a decade (it was in fact the destination for the Rebbe's first shlichim), there was much to do, and widespread poverty and illness, Rabbi Raskin said.

Habad Lubavitch, as it's known in Morocco, offers synagogue, school and mikvah services to the entire country, under the direction of Rabbi Raskin. His wife runs one of the schools.

With 70 Lubavitch institutions, they even serve small villages not accessible by car, he noted. For nearly two decades, the organization has run a seaside overnight camp for children.

Since 1984, when the Rebbe issued a directive to study Rambam (Maimonides), Rabbi Raskin has led an annual delegation to the 12th-century scholar's former home in the Arab quarter of Fez for a siyyum (culmination of the studies). Access to the private home was arranged through the Moroccan government.

At the recent Toronto event, there were a number of the rabbi's former students.

"You should have seen how emotional it was. Every move reminded them of something from their childhood," said Rabbi Israel Landa, Chabad's rabbi for Toronto's Hebrew-speaking community, and Rabbi Raskin's host.

One former student even recalled the brand of cigarette Rabbi Raskin (now an ex-smoker) used to smoke.

Rabbi Raskin's son, Rabbi Mendel Raskin (director of Beth Chabad in Montreal) spoke here last year about his life growing up in Morocco. That talk inspired Rabbi Landa to invite the senior Rabbi Raskin, he recalled.

In 1950, Morocco was home to 350,000 Jews, Rabbi Raskin said. Today, he estimates, there are only 4,000 or 5,000. The Ashkenazi families who fled Nazi Europe for Morocco have also left, he added.

Rabbi Raskin's six children have left Morocco, but he has no intention of following them. "As long as there are Jews there," he said, "I have a mission."

Administrative Assistant to the Rabbi

Congregation Darchei Noam is seeking a part-time Administrative Assistant to provide administrative support and assistance to the Rabbi. Required tasks include: correspondence, maintaining files and records, scheduling appointments and facilitating connections between the Rabbi, congregants and the larger community.

The successful candidate will have office experience, a good telephone manner, excellent written and spoken English, relevant computer skills, organizational ability, knowledge about Jewish life-cycle events and rituals, and the ability to work with people, sometimes in an emotionally charged situation. A reading knowledge of Hebrew is an asset.

This is a challenging position, providing a rewarding opportunity to serve a modern Jewish congregation.

Prof. lives in the reel world

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Amnon Buchbinder's reel world revolves around movies.

Apart from being a professor of film and video at York University, he is a screenwriter, a script doctor, a story analyst and a former film festival programmer.

Buchbinder, whose father Howard is a retired professor of social science at York University and whose mother Judith Weisman is a psychotherapist in private practice, developed an interest in film at a very early age.

"I made a Super 8 film in a Grade 6 class at Bialik, and it was pure bliss. I asked my parents for a camera for my birthday, and never stopped. Why? Who knows? The process of concretizing the imagination fascinates me, I guess."

Buchbinder – whose Genie award-winning 1998 film, The Fishing Trip, was acclaimed by critics – teaches screenwriting and directing to around 250 undergraduates and 40 graduates.

"In a way, teaching has been an aspect of what I've done almost since I started making movies at the age of 12," he explained. "I taught a screen education class when I was in high school. I got a job teaching filmmaking to celebrities' kids at a private high school in Los Angeles."

After studying at the California Institute of the Arts, Buchbinder, now 41, taught film production at Simon Fraser University for three years. In 1995, after a film project fell apart, he joined York University.

It's clear that, for Buchbinder, teaching is a labour of love.

"It enables me to think deeply about my own craft and technique and finding experimental ways of communicating these insights to students. I enjoy being in an environment where thought and reflection is encouraged and demanded. I love both working one-on-one with students, particularly grad students, and with groups."

Asked about his teaching style, he described it is a blend of reverence for the creative process, a broad understanding of cinema, a devotion to stories, a thorough knowledge of filmmaking, and an appreciation of the realities of the film industry.

"I work hard to synthesize these sometimes contradictory facets," said Buchbinder, the father of two children whose wife, Elyse Pomeranz, teaches at a Waldorf school.

One of his greatest joys is watching students fulfilling their dreams. "Every year, a few of my students mole their way into the industry. My biggest 'success' so far has been Michelle Lovretta, who wrote The Fishing Trip, which deals with the harrowing road trip of three young women confronting their past."

Amazingly enough, The Fishing Trip began as a 30-minute screenplay in one of his courses. "Michelle and I worked together to develop it into a feature," said Buchbinder, whose previous films, all of which were documentaries, have been screened at film festivals from Cannes to Toronto. (One of them, We're All Related, is described by Buchbinder as "the world's first Yiddish music video.")

From the first draft of the script to the completion of filming, a little more than two years elapsed before The Fishing Trip was finished. "It's pretty fast when you consider I was teaching full time throughout."

Buchbinder set out to make The Fishing Trip, which the Toronto Star hailed as "a minor marvel of dramatic economy," with merely $65,000 in hand. "Simply finishing it felt like a triumph. The fact that it got national theatrical release with very strong reviews was a bonus."

Since then his star pupil has moved on. "Michelle is busy with a bunch of TV projects and is getting offers from television shows in Los Angeles. Michelle is pretty unique. She basically came out of the womb writing poems, and she has had amazing luck. It takes most people a few years after graduating to begin finding their feet. It's an industry where dues must be paid.

"I have a handful of screenwriters out there who, I know, are going to break through soon. I spend a lot of my time writing reference letters, making introductions, but mostly they just have to keep at it."

Buchbinder, who is currently developing a film titled A Travelling Medicine Show, a fantasy that he regards as a 180 degree turn from The Fishing Trip, is nothing if not versatile.

Amnon Buchbinder

As a programmer, he has worked for the Pacific Cinematheque, the Vancouver International Film Festival and the Toronto International Film Festival. And as a script doctor and story analyst, he has dissected films such as Dog Park and Superstar.

"I work only on films I am personally excited by. It's very hard to develop a good screenplay. First-rate screenplays are rare. It's a very difficult form of storytelling to master. The film industry is driven by money, not art, and therefore, there are many things in the development process which work against creativity."

Buchbinder, whose favourite films include The Crying Game, The Piano and Gods and Monsters, is content to remain in Canada. "Hollywood has enough people banging on its doors. I did have discussions with some agents in L.A. after The Fishing Trip came out, but they won't take on someone who is teaching full time.

"Sure, it would be nice to get paid 10 times as much. But as long as I can feed my kids, it's not as important to me as the opportunity to do the work I find creatively exciting. And, of course, I love the positive feedback between my work and my teaching. I'm not ready to give that up."

CHARITY AS A FAMILY AFFAIR: Raising money for charity is a mitzvah Amanda Belzowski's family has valued for generations. Over the past nine years the family has raised $10,000 for the Heart and Stroke Foundation. This year's efforts were highlighted by 2½-year-old Amanda's lemonade stand on Briancliff Drive in North York, which brought in $930. The youngster's philanthropic endeavours have garnered praise from several newspapers, including the Toronto Sun, a spot on the Global Television Network and even a letter from Ontario Premier Mike Harris. Dear Amanda,

I have learned recently that you raised more than $900 for the Heart and Stroke Foundation by selling lemonade in front of your home. I would like to commend you for donating your earnings to this very worthy cause.

It's always a delight for me to hear about the caring efforts and community spirit of young people. Like you, in our province. Through your generosity and kindness, you have made an important contribution to the ongoing battle against heart disease and stroke.

Congratulations on the success of your fundraising efforts, Amanda, and I wish you all the best.

Sincerely,

Michael D. Harris, MPP

Changing of the guard at Sha'arei Beth-El

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

OAKVILLE — There has been a changing of the guard at Sha'arei Beth-El Congregation of Halton.

Rabbi Edward Goldfarb, first full-time rabbi of the congregation, has retired after 18 years; taking his place is Rabbi Paul Sidlofsky, who for the past four years has been vice-principal at Leo Baeck Hebrew Day School.

Rabbi Goldfarb, 62, a Toronto native, was ordained at Hebrew Union College Jewish Institute of Religion in 1982. He was put in touch with the "fledgling" Oakville congregation by the Canadian Council of Reform Judaism in 1981 when the synagogue, then called Beth El Congregation, had 35 member families. After merging with the Burlington Jewish Community, it took on its present name.

Rabbi Edward Goldfarb

"It quickly became a full-service synagogue with a Hebrew school and a bar/bat mitzvah program, and in a very gutsy move it hired a full-time rabbi," said Rabbi Goldfarb.

In another gutsy move, he said "the synagogue took on a huge mortgage in order to expand its building.

"The members had a lot of foresight; they were looking ahead to when they would make bar mitzvahs, and they realized they needed space at the synagogue, otherwise they would have to go elsewhere. I embraced the idea [of expansion] wholeheartedly, and helped do a lot of fund-raising."

Eventually, the congregation – which now has 140 member families – hired an educational director and a part-time cantorial soloist.

"The message was, that by insisting the synagogue have a larger building and additional staff, the congregation would grow to the point of financial and psychological viability."

In his honour, he said, one of the members paid off the mortgage, so the synagogue is now debt-free. "It is a real success story. I had a vision [when I joined the congregation], and the members embraced that vision. We knew it could be a viable synagogue, and we set about making it happen."

Rabbi Paul Sidlofsky

Rabbi Goldfarb is now working part time at Holy Blossom Temple doing overflow pastoral work and some teaching. "Having a retired rabbi come in and help out is a great thing for a synagogue to do. I get to do all the stuff I'm good at, without worrying about the executive and board meetings which are inevitably part of a full-time rabbi's life. It is an exciting situation for me."

Rabbi Sidlofsky, 39, who took over as spiritual leader of the synagogue in early July, grew up in Toronto, was ordained from Leo Baeck College in London in 1988, and received a master's degree in Jewish education from Hebrew Union College in Los Angeles. He received the title of Reform Jewish educator from the National Association of Temple Educators for having a combination of academic qualifications and experience in the field.

"I wanted to return to congregational life, and I was looking for a small community where I could work closely with the congregants. Oakville is a comfortable place to live and raise a family," said Rabbi Sidlofsky, whose wife is expecting the couples first child in the fall.

He plans on increasing family programming at the synagogue, and would like to see the congregation become more visible in the community. "We now have weekly Shabbat services and I would like to see shorter, more informal, monthly services on Friday evenings. I would also like to increase adult education programming and offer an adult bnei mitzvah class.

"It is a small congregation, so it is feasible for me to be involved in all aspects of the synagogue. I plan on teaching in the religious school, and being a resource for the other teachers," he says.

Meanwhile, he says, his first goal is to get to know the congregants and listen to their needs and expectations. "It has the potential of being a very busy job, and I am very much looking forward to it. Its an exciting time for me and for the congregation."

Bidding adieu to a capital few

Scene in Ottawa
By G.K. SIMCOE

Summer in Ottawa typically heralds the departures of erstwhile political fixtures, as the various teams prepare their line-ups for the upcoming new fall season.

So, while the prime minister jets off to Japan for another round of G-8 (a favourite democratic parlor game that we'll look at next week), let's bid adieu to a few who made the nation's capital the special place it is.

Farewell Preston Manning! To some you will always be reviled as the outsider who destroyed the proud Progressive Conservative party. For others, you will forever be revered as the bold and courageous people's champion who dared to do politics differently. Either way, Ottawa will never be the same.

The sun sets in the west and so will British Columbia Alliance MP, Jim Hart, who is vacating his seat to allow his leader, Stockwell Day, to run in a byelection. Hart will be remembered as the (first) Reformer who had the temerity to question Manning's capacity as leader. Brutally humiliated by the caucus, Hart finally made it back into the fold after having done penance. It would be too bad if that episode overshadowed his relentless and brilliant work in opposition regarding the DND and APEC scandals. He defined the role of an opposition critic.

After 21 years in the House of Commons, it appears that Lloyd Axworthy is heading west too. Never able to advance his ambition to lead the Liberal party, Axworthy sought to leave his mark by redefining Canadian foreign policy. Canada is no longer a "middle" power; it is a "soft" power. Human security was the theme of his watch – and resulted in a couple of coups like the land mines treaty and the Rome treaty (International Criminal Court).

At the end of the day, though, Axworthy's contribution has always been hampered by his hostility to the United States, and his colleagues were frustrated by his inability to shake his left-leaning tendencies.

Finally, July marks the end of David Sultan's tenure as Israeli ambassador to Canada. As one political insider put it: "This guy saw more ministers, senior mandarins, leading journalists and other opinion shapers in his first four months than most ambassadors see over their four-year posting."

Sultan revolutionized the Israeli presence in Ottawa – mostly through his skills as a gourmet chef (you haven't lived unless you have tasted his smoked fishes), his warmth and humility. He is an outstanding individual and will be missed in Ottawa. We wish him well.

Professor to head new English translation of Midrash Raba

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — For the first time in 70 years, scholars will put together a major English translation of the Midrash Raba – the agaddic commentary on the Bible.

Dennis Stoutenberg, a professor of Judaic Studies at Providence College, a Christian school in southern Manitoba, will be editor-in-chief.

"There are some very good Hebrew and Spanish editions of the Midrash Raba," Stoutenberg says, "but very little available in English."

The last major English translation, he says, was the Soncino version in the 1930s. "Since then," he points out, "we have had new materials become available from the Vatican archives, the Qumran caves (Dead Sea Scrolls) and the Cairo Genizah."

The genizah is the place in a synagogue where old books and other religious items are stored. In the early years of the 20th century, a synagogue in Cairo was found to have 1,000 years worth of books and manuscripts stored in its genizah.

At a Society for Biblical Literature conference last year, Stoutenberg approached the Catholic Liturgical Press and the Jewish Publication Society and they agreed to co-publish the 22-25 volume work.

Dennis Stoutenberg

"This will be the first time that Catholic and Jewish academic publishers have come together to publish a major liturgical series," he points out.

Stoutenberg has been given a $2.5 million budget to produce the series. As well, 50 scholars from leading universities in Israel, England and North America have been recruited to work on the translations.

"This is the greatest team of midrash scholars that can be put together at this time in history," Stoutenberg says. "My role is not to play an instrument, but to conduct the orchestra allowing each member of the team to contribute to the overall sound which I am charged with fitting together."

The project is budgeted to last 15-20 years, but Stoutenberg expects that it will be completed within 10 years,

Although raised as a Christian, when Stoutenberg came to Winnipeg 10 years ago to teach New Testament and Biblical studies at Providence College, he and and his wife continued to pursue their already keen interest in Judaism.

"We were already keeping kosher before we came here," Stoutenberg says. "Before I accepted the job at Providence, I set out three conditions. I wanted to be able to create a Judaic Studies Department, which I was allowed to do. I wanted to integrate the department with tours to Israel. I also insisted on being allowed to participate in Winnipeg's Jewish community without repercussions and continue to practise Judaism."

Stoutenberg reckons that because Christianity is descended from Judaism, it is important for Christians to know about the parent religion and how it has evolved in modern times.

"Christian leaders have attempted to divorce Christianity from its Jewish roots," he says. "It is akin to the child kicking the parents out of the house."

Seven years ago, Stoutenberg began studying Torah with Winnipeg Rabbi Zushya Halparin.

Suspecting that Stoutenberg might have some Jewish ancestry, Rabbi Halparin encouraged him to research his genealogy, an opportunity that came up in 1996 while Stoutenberg was leading a group of students on a summer visit to Israel. He discovered that his mother is Jewish. In 1998, he had a bar mitzvah at the Kotel as a statement of his commitment to Judaism.

Stoutenberg says he has left Providence College partly due to the school's desire to close the Judaic Studies Department and also because of the new project.

He and his wife have relocated to Kitchener. He expects to be teaching at a university in southern Ontario next fall.

KKK member sentenced in Dartmouth

TORONTO — A Toronto white supremacist has been sentenced to two years in jail for uttering threats against a Black minister in Dartmouth, N.S., as well as threatening to destroy a predominately Black Baptist church and kill Black people.

The incidents occurred in April when Donna Marie Upson, 22, came to Nova Scotia on a mission to rid churches of Blacks and to recruit other racists.

Upson is a member of the Ku Klux Klan, the Nationalist party and the Aryan Nations.

"Unless her beliefs are renounced, I believe there is no hope for rehabilitation," said Provincial Court Judge Flora Buchan.

According to a report in the Halifax Herald, Buchan rejected a plea from Upson to reduce her sentence. "To lock me up would just irritate me more and not help me," Upson told the court.

Upson had several previous convictions for hate-related offences in Ontario, including punching a Black woman and trying to stab a Black youth.

After entering the predominately Black congregation of Victoria Road United Baptist Church, Upson was greeted by the pastor, Rev. Elias Mutale, who tried to talk to her about her views, but she would not listen, calling him names and using racial slurs. A similar incident occurred the next day when she returned to the church.

Karen Mock, national director of B'nai Brith's League for Human Rights, testified prior to Upson's sentencing about hate crimes and racist organizations. She testified that Upson is a typical example of a racist recruit, who are often young, uneducated, alienated and have low self-esteem.

Court was told that Upson was a social outcast who blamed others for her problems and fell in with racist skinheads. Upson's racist views are now so ingrained and she is so outspoken about them that she is segregated from other female prisoners at the Halifax Correctional Centre, the Herald reported.

Prior to her arrest in April, Upson had been living in parking garages. No local shelters would accommodate her because of her views.

Teens from small towns venture to Israel

Tova Arbis can't wait to set foot in Israel. "I'm so excited," the Sault Ste. Marie native says, that "I've been marking off my calendar for the past 275 days."

Arbis' excitement is echoed by 20 teenagers from small Ontario communities who will spend a month in Israel as part of Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario region's high school outreach project.

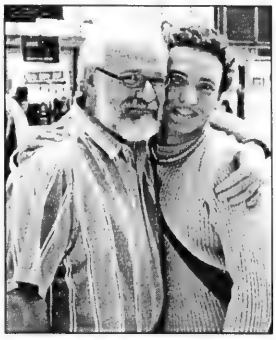
The project, says Michael Sobol, chair of Ontario region's small communities committee, provides the teens with a "connection to Jews and Judaism that these kids could never [have] made without this program."

Because many of the teens hail from towns with tiny Jewish populations, contact with a sizeable Jewish community is rare. The project, says CJC Ontario region executive director Bernie Farber, has helped the teens build a sense of Jewish community.

The tour of Israel is the culmination of three years of activities that have brought the group to Shabbatons, kallahs and a trip to the Holocaust Museum in Washington, D.C.

Adam Levine, a participant from Barrie, expects the trip to be unique. "Seeing history, where civilization began, that's an experience no other place can offer."

This is the fifth time CJC has sent a group of young people from small towns to Israel. Participants will cover several areas of the country, including Jerusalem, the Red Sea and the Golan Heights.



EXCITED FAREWELLS: Michael Sobol (left) hugs his son Jacob Gross-Sobol before sending him off to Israel for a month. Jacob is one of 20 Jewish teens from small Ontario towns travelling on the trip organized by CJC, Ontario region.

Mulroney headlines CJC confab

MONTREAL — Former prime minister Brian Mulroney will be the keynote speaker at the Canadian Jewish Congress, Quebec Region (CJC-Q) Plenary, Sept. 9 to 10.

Mulroney, who left office in 1993, will address the Sept. 10 luncheon session when the theme will be human rights.

CJC-Q chair Dorothy Zalcman Howard said, "throughout his tenure, Brian Mulroney showed considerable sensitivity to the concerns of the Jewish community and the State of Israel. Considerable progress was made on a number of these issues, including Nazi war criminals, with the appointment of the Deschênes commission, as well as multiculturalism. He was an ardent supporter of cultural diversity and many projects were funded."

At that luncheon, the first Alan Rose Human Rights Award will be presented to Rabbi Martin Penn, who was an activist in the campaign for Soviet Jewish emigration, and to Quebec Superior Court justice Juanita Westmoreland-Traoré, the first Black woman judge appointed in the province and a defender of minority rights.

The plenary, whose overall theme is Many Faces, One Community...New Directions in Advocacy, will be held all day Sunday, Sept. 10 at the Gelber Conference Centre of the Jewish Community Campus.

It will officially be kicked off the evening before at Karina's, a club on downtown Crescent Street, with a comedy revue called Politically Incorrect, Jewish Style. On stage will be radio host Tommy Schnurmacher; comedian Joey Elias; Université du Québec à Montréal history professor Yolande Cohen; political columnist Josée Legault; entertainment critic Jon Moore; and Bowser & Blue.

The next day, the morning session will feature a panel discussion of Covering or Creating the News: How do the media define the line? with Gazette publisher Michael Goldbloom, Michel C. Auger of the Journal de Montréal, Anthony Wilson-Smith of Maclean's magazine, former Gazette editorial page editor Jennifer Robinson, and John Parisella, former chief-of-staff to Premier Robert Bourassa.

Scheduled for the afternoon are four concurrent workshops on the Quebec and Canadian human rights charters with MP Irwin Cotler, Quebec Human Rights Commission president Claude Filion, and Canadian Human Rights Commission secretary-general John Hucker. There will also be workshops on health care, outreach and diversity within the Jewish community, and advocacy.

A town hall meeting will look at the Jewish community of Quebec circa 2025.

Popular talk show host Gerry Cammy of CFRA radio in Ottawa will lead a panel including McGill University principal Bernard Shapiro, McGill history department chair Gil Troy, FEDERATION CJA executive vice-president Danyael Cantor, and Avi Hyman of the Ontario Institute for Studies in Education.

The closing session of the day will look at the Middle East peace process.

ארבעים שנה במדבר

מידי יום ששי מרכה לי פאקס של פרשת השבוע ששולח לי הרב לנדא, וכך אני מתחיל לקבל את השבת בהרגשה חגיגית, וגם בתחושה שלמישהו אכפת ממני. זה אולי נשמע לכם קצת אידיוטי, אז למה שלא תנסח מס. הטלפון של הרב הוא 7000 731 905, ומספר הפאקס 7005 731 905. הוא ישמח לצרף אתכם לרשימה.

לפני שבועיים עסקה הפרשה בשנות המדבר, ובצורך של משה להוליך את הישראלים ארבעים שנה כדי שלארץ ישראל ייכנס דור חדש. הגידרה העממית קצת שונה: מדוע הלכו בני ישראל ארבעים שנה במדבר? כי משה תעה בדרך, וכמו כל גבר, מה פתאום שהוא יעצור וישאל הוראות כוון אבל שישאר בינינו.

ליגת איכות החיים

כמידי שנה מדרג האו"ם את מדינות העולם על פי איכות החיים שלהן, ומידי שנה מדורגת קנדה בראש הרשימה. ישראל נמצאת במקום ה 23 ומכובד, אבל צריך לזכור שלפני מספר שנים היתה ישראל במקום גבוה יותר(17). מסבירים לי שפער ההכנסה בין עשירים לעניים בישראל הולך וגדל, ושיש גידול משמעותי בממדי העוני בקרב יהודים חרדיים.

ואיך שמתפרסמת הסטטיסטיקה הזו, מתקיימת בישראל שביתה של שלושה חודשים במערכת הבריאות. אז איך זה מסתדר עם מקום כה גבוה באיכות החיים? אין לי מושג.

החברים של יאנה

לפני כשנתיים ייצג את אוסטרליה סרט נפלא על מהגרים סינים וקשיי הקליטה שלהם. הסרט דיבר סינית, והקסים אותי הרעיון שאוסטרליה הגאה מוכנה שסרט סיני ייצג אותה. השנה זכה ב"אוסקר" הבריטי סרט על מהגר פאקיסטני ומשפחתו. סך הכל מאד טבעי שסרט שעוסק במהגרים ידבר בשפתם ולא בשפת הארץ אליה הם הגיעו.

"החברים של יאנה" הוא סרט דובר רוסית ועברית, שעוסק בקליטתה של עולה צעירה מרוסיה, שנעזבת על ידי בעלה בחודש השלישי להריונה. נשמע כבד, אבל זהו סרט מדליק, מלא הומור ואסטונקה. "יאנה" הוא סירטו של רמי קפלן, ואשתו, אולין קפלן מגלמת את גיבורת הסרט. הסרט זכה ברוב פרסי האקדמיה הישראלית לסרטים, והוא ממש ממש הפתעה נעימה. תשע בסולם קורן. רוצו.

Jewish fraternity hires two Canadian chapter consultants

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — It's a "very unique" situation, says Andy Borans of Alpha Epsilon Pi's international office, referring to the fact that two of the 87-year-old Jewish fraternity's three chapter consultants for the coming academic year are Canadian.

Neil Grunberg

AEPi, North America's largest Jewish fraternity, boasts 105 chapters, of which only six are based at Canadian campuses (York University, the University of Toronto, the University of Western Ontario, McMaster University, McGill University and the University of British Columbia).

Among its 70,000 alumni, according to its Web site, are National Hockey League commissioner Gary Bettman, journalist Wolf Blitzer, and musicians Paul Simon and Art Garfunkel.

The Canadian chapter consultants – recent graduates Harley Gold, 21, of the University of Toronto, and Neil Grunberg, 23, of McGill University – are technically based at AEPi headquarters in Indianapolis, but, as Grunberg put it during a recent interview, he'll be living out of a suitcase and a car for the next year.

"A lot of people think I'm crazy because of that," said Grunberg, a Toronto native. "I look at it as an adventure."

The consultants were chosen from among 18 applicants, said Borans, the director of chapter services in Indianapolis.

Gold, also from Toronto, is responsible for chapters in the midwestern United States (extending as far south as Texas, and north into British Columbia); Grunberg for the Southeast and mid-Atlantic. Ironically, their American colleague, Michael Wellen (northeast region), covers five of the six Canadian chapters.

"AEPi has done tremendous things for me. I've learned so much from it," said Gold, a geography and religion major who plans to go back to school for an MBA.

He is looking forward to seeing much of the United States, as well as the challenge of helping existing chapters and setting up new ones.

He has first-hand experience in the latter, as a founding father of Tau Omega at U of T four years ago. As a consultant, his role in setting up new chapters, in part, will be to identify the "one or two right people" on site who can get the ball rolling.

Learning how to work with others is the "best skill" Gold has gained through Tau Omega, which he and some friends set up as a Jewish vehicle for sports, philanthropy, parties and just hanging out.

Running a meeting, planning a budget and recruiting new members were among the useful skills he learned, he said. Most challenging was making a go of the chapter at the end of the first year, when membership had dwindled to 7 people.

"We worked really hard," said Gold, who was AEPi's 1999 international fraternity president of the year. In the first month of his second year at U of T, 22 new recruits joined the chapter. There are about 50 members now, he said.

"We had help from the international fraternity. That's one of the reasons I wanted to [become a chapter consultant]."

Likewise, Grunberg wants to give back to the organization, which he credits for giving him the opportunity to develop leadership skills and learn to manage his time.

Harley Gold

Initially he didn't think AEPi was for him, but changed his mind after attending a Yom Kippur fast-breaking. "It was a really nice gesture and I realized these were the kind of people I'd want to associate with for my university years."

The fraternity did a lot of work with Hillel (like its counterparts in other cities), he noted. From his point of view, the biggest difference between Hillel and AEPi is the opportunity for students at the fraternity to self-govern to a greater extent.

Grunberg, who completed a Bachelor of Commerce, worked his way up from scribe (secretary) to master (president) in his final year.

In his final year he lived in AEPi's frat house at McGill. AEPi's other Canadian fraternity house is at Western. In the United States, living in frat houses is more common.

"It's fun," Grunberg said. "The downside is, there's 50 guys coming to your house all the time [for meetings, parties and Shabbat dinners]." But, he added, that's also the upside.

Baycrest's phone 'angels' reach out to seniors

TORONTO — Leon Kuperberg, Al Pottens and Dorothy Buckhalter all believe in the "invisible angels."

The three seniors live in their own homes and receive phone calls from their angels every week.

Just who are these angels? They are phone volunteers with the Seniors Support Program at Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care.

The three-year-old program helps more than 250 seniors, many of whom are frail and living alone, in the Toronto area. Some are on the waiting list for long-term care, others may be recently widowed or struggling to look after a sick spouse.

Calling up a senior to say, "Hello, how are you today?" is a simple gesture that makes them feel valued and cared about, said social worker Lesley Patterson, who co-ordinates the program. In some cases, it can be a lifeline for a senior who is unable to get out much and feels isolated. The phone volunteer is backed up professionally by an in-house social worker and registered nurse.

Kuperberg is 89 years old and looks after his wife of 62 years, Rachel, who has suffered a series of strokes. Every Tuesday morning, he looks forward to a call from his phone angel, Freda Slotnick.

"It's a full-time job caring for my wife," Kuperberg said. "I'm very thankful when people call to ask how I am doing. It's just a simple phone call, but it means so much to me."

At a recent social tea at Baycrest, Kuperberg and other seniors from the community had a chance to meet their phone volunteers in person. It was an emotional moment with lots of hugs and tears all around.

Baycrest phone "angel" Freda Slotnick (centre) calls Leon Kuperberg every week. They are seen here with Leon's wife Rachel.

Kuperberg was moved to give a speech. He said Slotnick is his "invisible angel."

"When a strange person you've never met calls you, you ask, 'Why are you calling me?'" he told the audience. "The caller says, 'To make you feel better,' and I say, 'Boy have you got the right number.'"

Buckhalter is a widow and former caregiver to her husband. "This is my angel on a Thursday morning," she said, holding the hand of her phone volunteer, Rose Besser.

Elvereene Kling, also a client of Besser's, piped in: "Rose is a wonderful person who brings a lot of sunshine for my husband and me."

A former Meals on Wheels volunteer, Besser was visibly moved by the kind words.

Pottens recently lost his wife to cancer. When she was ill, he was receiving calls from his phone angel Fred Gold on a weekly basis, to see how he was managing. Now widowed, he says the regular Wednesday phone chat with Gold really helps to pick up his spirits. They talk about Pottens' favourite sport, golf, and reminisce about Toronto in the good old days.

Being a phone volunteer isn't just about helping the person on the other end, said Gold, who is a retired school teacher. What he gets in return is a sense of satisfaction that he is reaching out to another life and making a difference.

"I didn't think I could do it," Gold said. "I'm not a doctor or a psychiatrist, but I learned that I have really good intuition about people. I can sense if they're feeling well or not well."

In her speech at the tea, phone volunteer Shirly Brazier captured the feelings of other volunteers when she said that helping others makes her feel good. "It's not a one-way street – us doing for them. We're helping each other."

Baycrest's Seniors Support Program is looking for more special people to be phone "angels" a few hours a week, either in the morning or in the afternoon.

"Ideally, we're looking for retired people because they often have similar life experiences to those of their senior clients and can relate and empathize with them," Patterson said.

For more information, contact the Seniors Support Program at Baycrest Centre, 416-785-2500, ext. 2250.

Barak tests Jerusalem compromise

By NAOMI SEGAL
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — As negotiators at Camp David were trying to find a formula for a lasting Middle East peace, Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Barak was said to be sounding out public reaction to a possible compromise on Jerusalem.

The Israeli daily Ha'aretz reported Sunday that private surveys conducted for Barak indicated that a large majority of the Israeli public favours an agreement that would end the conflict with the Palestinians, even if it included granting them some sovereignty in eastern Jerusalem.

An opinion survey published in the daily Yediot Achronot over the weekend showed the opposite result.

Jerusalem has emerged as the main sticking point in the Camp David talks – and, given such conflicting results, it is apparently just as difficult an issue for the polls to come to grips with.

While a U.S.-imposed news blackout on the substance of the talks continued, Barak briefed Israeli political figures on the status of the summit.

The two latest figures to hear from him were former members of his governing coalition, Yitzhak Levy of the National Religious Party and Natan Sharansky of the Yisrael Ba'Aliyah Party.

Both recently withdrew from the government to protest the Camp David summit, and both said it is unlikely an agreement will emerge from the talks.

Levy said it appeared Barak was preparing the ground to return to Israel without an agreement. Sharansky said Barak indicated he was open to a government with the opposition Likud Party if the summit fails. Sharansky, who supports such a government, said he would do what he could to help.

An aide to Barak told Israel Radio on Sunday that Clinton's return to the Camp David discussions was critical to their outcome.

Barak's spokesperson, Gadi Baltiansky, said the fate of the summit would be clear within 24 hours of Clinton's return.

"It won't be a whole lot of time," he told Israel Army Radio. When Clinton returns to Camp David, "We will see if there's any point in staying here and going on with the talks or to pack the luggage and return home."

Since first gathering in Camp David on July 11, Israel and the Palestinians have been holding intense negotiations in a bid to come up with a final peace agreement.

Before going to the summit, Barak repeatedly stated that he would not budge from his stance that Jerusalem remain Israel's united, sovereign capital.

For his part, Palestinian Authority President Yasser Arafat said he would not abandon his demand that the eastern half of the city be the capital of a future Palestinian state.

In recent days, there were reports indicating that Barak is willing to consider an American bridging proposal that would grant Israel and the Palestinians some sort of shared sovereignty over Arab neighbourhoods in the capital, granting the Palestinians a form of administrative rule in the city.

Arafat was expected to respond to the proposal last Sunday. Meanwhile, Barak denied that he is being pressed by senior ministers on his negotiating team to make compromises on Jerusalem.

Barak issued the statement Sunday after unnamed aides claimed that ministers Amnon Lipkin-Shahak and Shlomo Ben-Ami are pushing Barak to soften his stance on Jerusalem, which has emerged as the main sticking point in the Camp David talks.

Convicted Iranian Jews appeal verdict

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Seven of the 10 Iranian Jews convicted of engaging in hostile activity on Israel's behalf filed appeals last week, according to the spokesperson of the defence team in the trial, attorney Ismail Nasri. He said the remaining three appeals will be filed soon.

Thirteen Jews were tried and ten sentenced to prison terms ranging from four to 13 years. Three of the original defendants were acquitted.

Nasri said the Jews were not convicted of espionage but of establishing "illegal groups" and "collaborating with an enemy state."

Israel condemned the convictions and denied that the Iranian Jews operated on Israel's behalf.

Opinion No leader will offer a better deal

By DAN MARGALIT
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

The Camp David summit entered its final stage this week. The moment of truth is now, and that fact is producing tension and turbulent emotions among the summit's participants.

The toughest fight of Barak's life is about to draw to a close and then an even tougher one will immediately commence.

If he returns to Israel without a signed peace treaty, he will come under fire from the ardent supporters of peace with the Palestinians. They will not forgive him for the way he has treated them, despite the fact that, more than any of his predecessors, Barak has put his political career on the line in order to achieve a peace agreement with the Palestinians.

Barak can fend off their criticism because he can always say to them that he accepted the American compromise that was rejected by Palestinian Authority Chairman Yasser Arafat. The prime minister might even be able to establish an alternative coalition, because the failure of the negotiations could start a Palestinian conflagration in the wake of a unilateral declaration of Palestinian statehood in September.

Hints that the Likud might join the government in a state of national emergency have already been made by Limor Livnat and Tzachi Hanegbi.

Such a national unity government would be stable because it would enjoy broad support as it deals with anticipated Palestinian violence. However, even if that government manages to survive until the end of the present Knesset, it will be, by its very nature, a sort of interim coalition.

If, however, Barak returns to Israel with the draft of a peace agreement, he can expect a struggle without precedent in the history of peace accords. He will be accused of having adopted the principles of the Beilin-Abu Mazen document out of pure selfishness, namely, his desire to hold on to his prime ministership.

His chief difficulty will be to persuade the majority of Israelis to go beyond where they have traditionally drawn the line and to give him their support.

If a peace agreement is signed with the Palestinians, Barak can credit himself with several important achievements. Most of the settlements will remain where they are, under Israeli jurisdiction, while most of the settlers will remain where they are, as Israeli citizens; Israeli sovereignty over the Western Wall will be officially recognized as will be Israel's sovereignty over two of the four quarters of the Old City of Jerusalem, which will be expanded to the north and south; the Palestinian state will be permitted to hold only light arms; the Jordan River will effectively be our security border; and the end of the Palestinian-Israeli dispute will be declared.

Nonetheless, despite these achievements, Barak has given his consent at Camp David to far-reaching concessions.

The best course of action for Arafat is to study these concessions and, especially, to weigh the alternative. Barak has already announced that his flexibility will disappear if he is not given an affirmative reply and that his flexibility will not serve as the basis for discussions in the next round of talks. And what is most important, he has declared that, in the foreseeable future, no one will offer the Palestinians what he has agreed to propose to them.

The only alternative to a peace agreement will be another round of bloody violence and Arafat should understand the following point.

If he rejects such a generous parcel of proposals (both Arafat and his commentators are never satisfied) and if a violent confrontation takes place, Israel will have no reason to limit the firepower of the Israel Defence Forces when it responds to the violence.

Too many Israelis, who have felt themselves personally insulted at the sight of their prime minister eating humble pie while softening his positions, will give him total support to use whatever firepower is needed to combat a wave of Palestinian rioting.

Right wing extremists worry Shin Bet

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — The growing tension over the outcome of the Camp David summit has brought a significant escalation in rhetoric by members of the extreme right about a possible assassination attempt on Prime Minister Ehud Barak, Shin Bet security service head Avi Dichter told the cabinet at its weekly meeting on Sunday.

Dichter added that there was also talk of killing Palestinian leader Yasser Arafat or blowing up the mosques on the Temple Mount – an act that would unleash havoc in the region – in an attempt to prevent implementation of a possible peace treaty.

Dichter said "fringe elements" on the far right have been discussing these possibilities for some time, but added that talk has intensified as progress is reported in the negotiations. However, he said, as far as the Shin Bet knows, no practical planning or initiatives have been undertaken, and the organization is continuing to monitor the extreme right.

A senior source in the Shin Bet told Ha'aretz that the secret service has not made any substantial changes in the procedures for protection of cabinet ministers, which is beefed up or reduced in line with ongoing situation appraisals.

The Shin Bet has recently summoned several activists on the extreme right for talks or warnings after they expressed themselves strongly in favour of assassinating the prime minister.

These scenarios, Dichter told the cabinet, could become operative if Barak returns from Camp David with an agreement not to the liking of the far right, or if he returns without a settlement but with the option for further talks with the Palestinians.

Foreign Minister and acting Prime Minister David Levy asked whether the scenarios were based on hard facts. "We cannot accept something like this without knowing what information it is based on," he said.

Dichter replied that the Shin Bet did not have information about any specific attempts to organize.

Minister Haim Ramon, who is responsible for Jerusalem affairs in the cabinet, noted that the Temple Mount is today less well protected than the Tomb of the Patriarchs in Hebron and that decisions to increase the security there have not yet been implemented.

According to Communications Minister Binyamin Ben Eliezer, it is always difficult to protect the Temple Mount "hermetically," as some "lunatic" can always find a way to enter the site. At this period especially, he said, it is therefore important for the security forces in charge to act "ruthlessly."

Minister for Diaspora Affairs Michael Melchior observed that the Temple Mount would be the easiest place at which to carry out attacks.

The Week in Israel

July 17

• U.S. President Bill Clinton called the Camp David negotiations the "hardest thing I've ever seen."

• Officials voiced concern after Iran successfully fired a medium range missile. IDF chief of staff, Lt.-Gen. Shaul Mofaz, told Israel Radio that the Shihab 3 Missile poses a threat not only to Israel, but to any other country within its 800-mile range.

July 18

• The High Court of Justice agreed to reconsider its recent decision allowing the Women of the Wall group to hold services at the Western Wall.

July 19

• The former head of the UN body that inspected Iraqi weapons capabilities said Iraqi Deputy Prime Minister Tariq Aziz had told him Baghdad developed biological weapons to deal with the "Zionist entity." Richard Butler was speaking in Jerusalem at a lecture sponsored by the Jerusalem Centre for Public Affairs.

July 20

• Judges will be able to forbid publication of any matter that comes before the courts if they believe it would severely violate the privacy of a party or a witness, according to a bill that Justice Minister Yossi Beilin said he will present to the Knesset in two weeks.

July 21

• According to The Dahaf Institute, 70 percent of Israelis do not support handing over any part of east Jerusalem to the Palestinians; 27 percent are in favour. The poll also found that 61 percent of Israelis believe a true agreement with the Palestinians is impossible; 38 percent believe it is possible.

The lessons I learned at Camp David

By ADAM SHARON
Special to The CJN

Driving from Washington to Camp David on a muggy Thursday, July 13, morning, I was genuinely excited. Within a month of graduating from McGill University and beginning my employment as the White House correspondent for the Talk Radio News Service, I was approaching Camp David, site of tense Israeli-Palestinian peace negotiations.

Realizing the significance of the moment, I promised myself not to squander this precious day at Camp David.

Commentary

At press briefings, I would ask probing questions of press secretary Joe Lockhart. Should any Israeli or Palestinian delegation member walk in my direction, I would confront the individual, demanding an update on the status of negotiations. I was about to become an eyewitness to history, and nothing would spoil that opportunity.

Arriving in Thurmont, Md., I was instructed to proceed, not to Camp David, but to the local elementary school. This seemed odd, but I gathered that press corps members, upon passing a security inspection, would eventually be shuttled to Camp David. I was, however, mistaken.

Camp David was sealed to reporters, and an impregnable news blackout had been imposed by the American, Israeli and Palestinian delegations. The Thurmont Elementary School would be my base throughout this one-day "Camp David" experience. Disappointed, I shuffled toward my office space, expecting to see buzzing reporters chatting on cellular phones, researching news stories and interviewing important political figures.

Again, my expectation did not match the reality. Most correspondents seemed tired and irritable. Few were dressed in business attire, and all looked forward to the Friday afternoon summit recess in respect of the Jewish Sabbath.

Within five minutes, my dreams had been shattered. Covering Camp David would not be a glamorous experience, but instead, tedious work. Officials from the White House, the State Department, and the Israeli and Palestinian delegations rarely visited the press centre at the Thurmont school. Their occasional appearances, while causing a stir among the press, were purposeless.

These officials respected the blackout and would provide reporters with minimal information. Dejected, I stayed at my work area, staring at a blackboard decorated with the 26 letters of the alphabet. This I had already done at the Associated Hebrew Day Schools of Toronto – I did not need to relive that experience at Thurmont Elementary School.

My highlight that day was lending my umbrella to the Israeli Channel 2 news team, who were preparing to broadcast a live report to viewers at home. While pleased to assist my colleagues, I became increasingly frustrated. My umbrella was more involved than I was in the Camp David experience! Wanting to avoid traffic, I left the elementary school and returned to Washington, having failed to fulfil my goals.

On the drive home, I began to reconsider my day. What seemed so ordinary at Thurmont Elementary School suddenly seemed momentous. I recalled observing Israeli reporters, approximately 25 in total, in a large classroom. To their left, in a separate room, some 15 individuals from Arab press agencies gathered, performing tasks exactly like those of their Jewish counterparts. Both groups had non-existent stories to cover and stringent deadlines to meet. Members of the two delegations seemed bored, hoping for a breaking announcement to perk up their spirits. Their mutual wish was, unfortunately or fortunately, not granted.

Then it struck me. I had witnessed the model for coexistence that Prime Minister Ehud Barak and Chairman Yasser Arafat were seeking. A solid, yet semi-porous divide separated the two media delegations. Each party interacted with its own people, but could, as they often did, intermingle. In this case, all correspondents pursued one goal, namely, ascertaining newsworthy information that they could transmit to their readers, viewers and listeners. Was this not the fruit of Middle East peace already coming to fruition?

As the scene of this discussion shows, the tension in the air at Camp David last week was quite evident. [RNS photo]

This parallel is not intended to belittle the difficult matters that faced the Israeli and Palestinian delegations at the real Camp David. But the image I viewed at the Thurmont Elementary School was nonetheless powerful.

Two disparate yet similar groups, divided by religion, language and mentality, could coalesce. This principle speaks to the nub of the Arab-Israeli schism. Coexistence is workable only when both parties, as illustrated by these correspondents, work together to achieve a common goal. If Israelis and Palestinians can mirror their respective journalists' ways, peace in the Middle East can one day flourish.

If anyone needs it, I can supply the umbrella.

Adam Sharon is White House correspondent for the Talk Radio News Service.

'We need a paradigm shift in relations'

By RABBI MICHAEL MELCHIOR

The Jewish people is potentially ready to enter a new era, one of great strength and creativity.

But we're not there yet.

The obstacles we have to overcome – assimilation, internal rifts – are formidable. To achieve the potential of this moment in Jewish history, there are some key processes – the peace process with our neighbours, for example – that we must nurture.

Redefining the relationship between Israel and world Jewry is one of these processes. We need a paradigm shift in the way we see Israel's relationship with Jewish communities abroad. As Israel's minister of world Jewry, I will do all I can to help transform our relationship to Jews abroad – for the good of us all.

First, we have to understand the problematic nature, until recently, of our connection. The return of the Jewish people to our homeland, was a miraculous event – especially coming as it did right after our darkest moment. Israel's founding and achievements gave strength to Jews everywhere.

Unfortunately, Israel's representatives often took a patronizing attitude towards Jews abroad. We Israelis were the stars of the drama; you, in the Diaspora, had the supporting role. We were the end; you could help provide the means. We were the future; you were the remnant of the past. And it was a past we sometimes preferred to repress. For many Zionists, "the negation of the exile" was a cherished value. As the vanguard of history, Israelis determined how history was to be interpreted – and even how Jewish identity should be defined.

The problem was more than our attitude. Sometimes what was best for the Jewish people was pushed aside out of political necessity. Such was the case when Israel's founding prime minister, David Ben-Gurion, made a deal with Israel's religious parties on religious issues. In retrospect, I believe that the status quo this deal froze in place was bad for Judaism in the broad sense, because it handed the religious establishment a monopoly on religion, alienating many Jews, especially abroad.

Ben-Gurion himself first sparked my awareness that official Israel was not always in tune with other Jewish communities. On a 1962 visit to Denmark, where I grew up, he essentially called for the liquidation of the Danish Jewish community. Danish Jews should move to Israel, Ben-Gurion said. Jewishness could not be maintained elsewhere; Jews could never trust the intentions of their gentile neighbours.

Ben-Gurion's speech was "jarring" to my grandfather, Rabbi Marcus Melchior, then chief rabbi. Though he admired Ben-Gurion as a leader, he expressed his disagreement on this issue publicly. Having played a significant role in the rescue of Danish Jewry during the Nazi occupation, my grandfather knew that the Danes had proven themselves friends at the moment of greatest danger. As the scion of a family that had served Danish Jewry as rabbis for six generations, he felt that Danish Jews had a right to believe in the future of their community in Denmark.

Today, Israel is unquestionably the centre of the Jewish world. More Jewish children are born in Israel than in all other countries together. Israel has become Jewry's spiritual, intellectual and cultural capital. Exactly because of Israel's phenomenal success, we may now have the strength to admit that we need strong Jewish communities abroad, perhaps as much as they need us. By realizing that the future of the Jewish people is a responsibility we share, we may be able to turn back the tide of assimilation and find the spiritual power to transmit our tradition and values to generations to come.

Some changes can already be seen in Israel. Ten years ago, when Meimad first began to oppose religious legislation, our position was considered heretical. Now, this position is considered legitimate even among the haredim. In exile, it was clear that no Jewish group could force its view of Judaism on others. In Israel, we forgot this lesson. As an Orthodox rabbi, I have strong beliefs about Judaism. But I don't have the right to enforce a standard for others who want a relationship with Judaism. This message is beginning to be heard.

Israelis are also starting to realize that contact with the world's Jewish communities strengthens Jewish identity here. We need strengthening. There are schools in Israel where not one student attends Yom Kippur services.

Israel often has a catalytic effect on the Jewish identity of young people, and the Birthright program, which will bring tens of thousands a year to Israel is an important step in utilizing this effect.

But the influence is mutual. Israelis travelling abroad often experience a strengthening of their Jewish identity. Aliyah itself is dependent on the strength of Jewish communities abroad. Israel and world Jewry make up a whole that is greater than the sum of its parts. Together, we can spark a renaissance whose dimensions will include the entire Jewish people.

Taste the world at the 7th annual Krinos Foods Taste of the Danforth Friday Aug. 11 — Sunday Aug. 13

In 1999, over 800,000 people came to the Krinos Foods Taste of the Danforth, making GreekTown home to the largest food festival in Canada. The event has grown tremendously in the six short years since its inception, from a first-year total attendance of 5,000.

A large part of this growth can be traced to the growing interest in ethnic foods. As noted by Eric Moscahlaidis, President of the founding sponsor Krinos Foods, "Over the years, Toronto has become famous for its lively, multicultural image. And where better to experience authentic, ethnic foods than in the heart of the largest GreekTown in North America?"

The restaurants participating in the Krinos Foods Taste of the Danforth pride themselves on offering high quality, authentic foods. For many Canadians the Krinos Foods Taste of the Danforth is the first chance to try a different type of cuisine, at a very moderate price (the "tastes" are only $1 – $3).

But the Krinos Foods Taste of the Danforth is not only about food; it is also about sharing culture. The BBI Bell Mobility Main Stage will showcase Canadian groups and, for the first time, Greek bands. Last year, many Canadians of non-Greek background asked for Greek music on the main stage as well as the special Greek Stage. This year, Ivana Santilli will be the headliner on Friday night, Cowboy Junkies on Saturday night, and The Jim Cuddy Band on Sunday night.

According to Sue Zindros, Chair of GreekTown on the Danforth BIA, owner of Mezes Restaurant and a founder of the Krinos Foods Taste of the Danforth, "People come to GreekTown and to the Krinos Foods Taste of the Danforth to sample our cuisine, listen to the Greek music and learn the Greek dances. I personally am very proud of our community."

The "Taste" has raised significant monies for charity since its inception in 1994. To date, almost $200,000 has been raised for the Toronto East General Hospital. A number of other charities have also benefitted.

There are many activities for the entire family. Amusement rides for the children, inflatables in front of Shoppers Drug Mart as well as a Changing Area and Nursing Station, the Express Souvlaki Greek Stage, the VISA Fashion and International Stage, the BBI Telecommunications/Bell Mobility Waiter Race.

And for the first time, visit the Dominion Store Recipe Stage presented on the Budweiser Big Rig. Learn how to make an authentic Greek Salad, Spanakopita, or cook Souvlaki. The Dominion Store Recipe Stage will be located at Jackman and Danforth.

Purchase a lottery ticket for $2 from the Royal Bank branches in the GreekTown area or the Toronto East General Hospital volunteers at the "Taste" and you could win a Ford Focus compliments of Rowland on Eglinton Ford Lincoln or a Trip for Two to Greece compliments of Regent Holidays and Air Transat. Proceeds go to the Toronto East General Hospital.

Health and taste reign at Mezes

One trend that has gained momentum in recent years is the emphasis on healthy eating, both inside the home and out. No longer is it sufficient for restaurants to please your palate; they must now also nurture your well-being.

Front and centre in this movement is Mezes, where Sue Zindros and her sister Christine, the head chef, have staked their reputation on innovative cuisine that combines freshness and quality in equal measure. Nightly lineups attest to the success of this formula, to which the sisters unwaveringly adhere.

"Healthy eating is not a bonus, it's a given," says Sue. "The question isn't if your ingredients are pure and fresh, but how pure and fresh they are. We don't serve anything here that we wouldn't serve in our own home, because, when our customers come here, this is their home."

Furthermore, says Sue, customers do compare the dishes they eat in restaurants with those they prepare in their own kitchen, and are entitled to expect the same high standards and superb taste. Consistency is critical, she notes; the same quality must be maintained day after day, week after week. Despite widespread public acclaim, "we never act like we've "made it." We feel that we have to prove ourselves daily, both in the way we feed people and in the way we treat them."

Can you taste the difference that purity makes? To the unrefined palate, olive oil is olive oil; to the afficionado, however, the first-cold-pressed, extra-virgin variety used at Mezes is magical, as are the fresh herbs that flavour and garnish almost every dish.

Vegetarian dishes, often a bland letdown elsewhere, are terrifically zesty; the entire menu, in fact, will redefine your notions of Greek cuisine and raise the bar on your expectations. The fresh fish is heavenly, the selection marvellous. Try the lamb chops — the ultimate test — and you'll understand why Mezes has gone to the head of the class.

Dishes are prepared slowly, lovingly, one by one, and they keep customers coming back in droves. Always active but never too busy to welcome you warmly, Mezes is the quintessential Greek restaurant.

Avec Plaisir fits intimate apparel

If you've ever known the frustration of buying a bra that's a quarter size off, you'll be relieved to know there's a shop that not only shares your obsession with finding the perfect fit, but will go you one better.

"There's no reason to be apologetic about it," says Vasilia, who owns the shop with Peter, her husband and partner. "Fit is vitally important with any item of clothing, but with intimate apparel, it's critical. If your bra or panties don't fit perfectly, you'll be reminded of it every time you put them on."

Accordingly, Vasilia, Peter and staff spend as much time as necessary to ensure that the sometimes elusive goal is always achieved. "We are not in the volume business," notes Peter. "We're in the service business."

With an 18-year track record, Avec Plaisir is sought out by women citywide who want to get it right the first time. Quality and selection don't hurt either; to that end, Avec Plaisir carries the crème de la crème of lingerie, swimwear and hosiery lines. The combination of high-quality merchandise, expertise and personal service has resulted in an ever-growing clientele, who take the utmost "plaisir" in shopping at Avec Plaisir.

GREEKTOWN ON THE DANFORTH

Korry's and Greektown joined at the hip

Q. What's been around longer — the Danforth or Korry's?

Q: Who is this man who keeps reminding us about both?

The Jewish prerogative of answering a question with another question fits any conversation with Saul Korman, who's never shy about providing answers — especially about the Danforth and Korry's, the menswear store he founded 48 years ago. Korman's unbridled enthusiasm about both has fostered a symbiotic relationship between man and street: the two have come to be synonymous.

If you didn't already know that the Danforth was the centre of the universe, Korman will make sure you do. "Looking for an area with a few nice restaurants? We've got 50 great ones for starters." Need a sunny patio to show off your newly-acquired Canali suit? Korman won't just direct you, he'll take you there — and put in a good word to ensure you get the usual royal treatment ++.

Eurostreet uniqueness vs. mall monotony

The Danforth experience is one Korman recommends to anyone who dreads a typically monotonous afternoon at the local shopping mall. "Where would you rather be on a sunny day like today?" he queries. "In a cloned mall with a hundred cloned stores, or on a European boulevard with 300 high-quality shops, restaurants and cafés?" Most Danforth establishments, Korman continues, are one-of-a-kind and owner-operated, meaning you'll get real personal service, not just the advertising-slogan variety. "Most of us grew up in neighbourhoods just like the Danforth," he notes. "We didn't grow up in malls." He also scoffs at the so-called "convenience" of plazas and the mythology of 'one-stop shopping'. "For your free parking you get to spend three hours wandering around indoors, eating chain-store fast food and buying chain-store merchandise. On the Danforth, for five dollars [the cost of all-day parking] you'll get one-of-a-kind quality and uniqueness, in the open air, maybe for less than you paid at the mall."

Always good for a one-on-one broadcast, Korman is well-known for his ad-libbed radio spots, delivered live from wherever he happens to be at air time — a Danforth café, Israel, Milan, the West Indies, or other locales. From an advertising standpoint, these takes are a refreshing departure from the endless sameness of mainstream radio commercials. Love him or hate him, you're sure to raise your antennae whenever he airs. He waxes poetic not only about the great values at Korry's, but also about his latest business and personal experiences. He brags about his successes, but also acknowledges his mistakes and shortcomings on air.

But Korry's lines of communication are not limited to broadcast and print. You can now visit Korry's anytime at www.korrys.com and get the latest scoop on his in-store collections, advice on what to buy and how to coordinate it. The site also offers valuable tips on wardrobe maintenance, and even recommends which dry cleaners will give you best results. If it relates to looking your best, you'll find it on Korry's website.

Casual attire in the workplace has gained acceptance in recent years, but the pendulum has begun to swing back towards tailored clothing, particularly in corporate circles. Hence the term "Dress-Up Thursdays": if you're out to do business, you should look the part. Korman and his staff will ensure that you do, right down to the colour of your socks. As evidence of their success, the business continues to expand; a recent major renovation was spectacularly successful, and the shop now employs six full-time tailors.

"My dream is to have every man in the world shop at Korry's," he says — "not for the money, but for the ego boost I get every time a customer walks in the door."

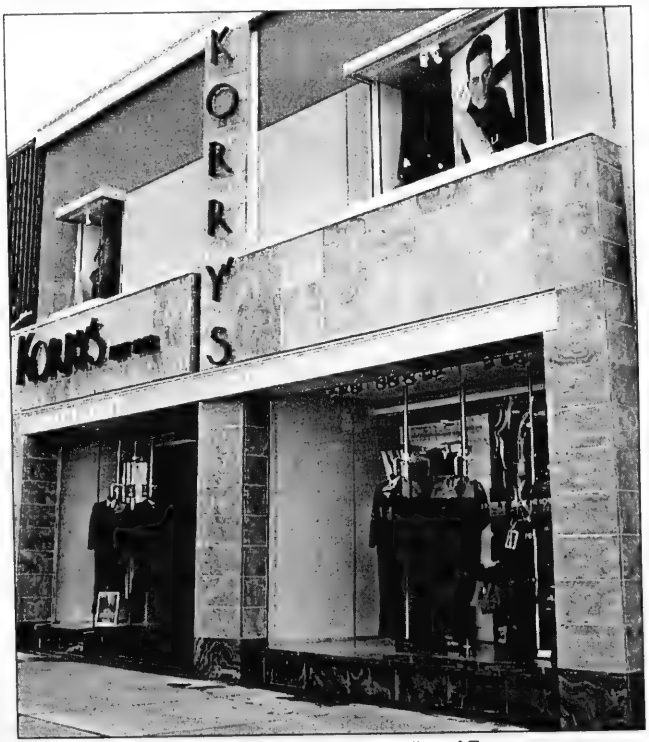
Korry's second-floor designer collections — Hugo Boss, Canali, Strellson and Arnold Brant — keep Korry's on the cutting edge of fashion,

Two-for-one takes on new meaning

while his main-floor two-for-one suits underscore his reputation for value. The beehive of activity on both floors keeps Korman hopping, even on his recently replaced knees. In that regard, Korman is effusive about the encouragement and support he received from customers, friends, family, and the staff at Mt. Sinai and St. John's Rehabilitation Hospital. Of course, no sooner did he emerge from surgery than he began extolling the virtues of "two-for-one knees."

The same qualities that make the Danforth attractive to the tourists who flock there should make it attractive to us, suggests Korman. "Too busy to travel? Take a four-hour holiday in your own city. The Danforth is the best place I know to stop and smell the roses."

With well over a million people expected to attend this year's Krinos Foods Taste of the Danforth (August 11 to 13), there's all the more reason to visit Korry's and enjoy the manifold offerings of this vibrant street.



Korry's on the Danforth: a little slice of Europe

Saul Korman, Danforth icon and spokesman

The following is an excerpt from Korry's website, which contains many interesting vignettes.

The Business of Dressing Well

Business dress is still very much a part of office life .... The suit is a type of uniform and as such, it appeals greatly to men who would rather concentrate on other things than what outfit to wear each day. In addition, the suit stands apart from other clothing by virtue of its crisper silhouette, cleaner detailing and use of fine fabrics .... It is important to realize that, unlike women's clothing, virtually all men's wear is based on certain dress codes that have been handed down to us throughout history. Most of us recognize these codes without really understanding them. For instance, a suit appears to us very like a uniform because long ago, it actually was a uniform...

GREEKTOWN ON THE DANFORTH

Let Pan on the Danforth entice you

The "Pan" in "Pan on the Danforth" has a twofold meaning: the cooking vessel, and the Greek nature spirit, known for the sweet, enticing sound of his pipes. Let both entice you!

Like all artists, proprietor Peter Kyriacou and chefs Ginos Frankoudis and Cathy Bolton are obsessed with excellence. Their unique interpretation of Greek cuisine combines fresh ingredients and attention to every exquisitely textured detail, to the delight of your palate.

PAN ON THE DANFORTH
516 Danforth Avenue 466-8158

Their diligence has made Pan Toronto's only three-star Greek restaurant, famous among celebrities across North America. When you need a departure from the culinary beaten path, this is the place for you too.

In 23 years' experience, Peter Kyriacou has learned that success depends not on a huge menu, but a limited number of superbly prepared dishes.

For a light appetizer, try a pita dip. The tzatziki, made from cucumbers and pure fresh-pressed yogurt, is heavenly. The taramosalata, a traditional Greek cod roe dip, is also delicious. There are light, summery salads as well.

The appetizers are equally enticing. For example, there's warm artichoke and new potato salad with sweet peppers, lemon, dill and cream; pan-seared chicken livers with white wine, herbs and lemon; or mussels steamed in wine, garlic, spinach, fresh herbs and cream.

The entrées will present you with equally tantalizing choices. There's hearty, traditional moussaka (a chopped beef, potato and eggplant casserole), served with green salad. Also for robust appetites, there's a half rack of lamb with roasted baby beets, walnut oil and feta scalloped potatoes.

Fancy lighter fare? Try santorini chicken stuffed with spinach and feta, served with lemon roast potatoes and seared rapini; or lemon roasted chicken breast, with fried onions and feta scalloped potatoes.

Finally, no Mediterranean menu is complete without seafood. Two selections of note: seared Atlantic salmon with feta pine nut pesto, lemon roast potatoes and seared rapini; and grilled sea bass with tomato, onion, capers and roasted garlic salsa, with lemon roast potatoes and seasoned spinach.

You'll enjoy these delectations amid gentle candlelight, with soft music providing a background for intimate, relaxed conversation. The ambience is casual, cozy and come-as-you-are, with a light touch of elegance. Reservations are recommended on weekends.

It's a wonderful place to dine and enjoy the company of family, friends, and the ever-present Greek muse.

CIBC makes difference in community

As Community Manager for East Toronto, Dave D'Amico has a twofold responsibility: one, to ensure a high quality of service within his member branches; and two, to promote goodwill and improve the quality of life in the surrounding community.

Dave D'Amico
CIBC Danforth Community Manager
421-0051

Not unique to East Toronto, this approach is part of a company-wide commitment to providing help where help is needed. Underscoring this fact, in 1999 the CIBC donated some $26 million to a wide variety of charities and causes, including the Baycrest Centre, Mount Sinai Hospital, Riverdale Hospital, Toronto East General Hospital, several schools, and countless community projects.

D'Amico favours a hands-on approach that sees him personally participating in fund-raising and other charitable events. He also takes pleasure in encouraging employees, associates and friends to do likewise.

D'Amico brings to the table an extensive background in both banking and volunteer work. And as someone who has lived and worked in the East Toronto area for a number of years, he is well-positioned to turn CIBC's strong presence in the area (14 branches) to good account.

Building goodwill starts within each branch, he says. "We want every single visit to be a happy one for our customers. This is a standard we strive to uphold each and every day." Good works outside the branch are a natural extension of this philosophy, he says. "We want people to think of the CIBC not only as a great place to bank, but as a good neighbour."

D'Amico's approachability, easygoing manner and work ethic have endeared him to East Toronto business people and members of the general community, and he relishes the opportunity to serve. The sense that he is helping to make a difference gives him "all the gratification I need. Giving back to the community isn't something that's nice to do, it's something we have to do."

D'Amico can be reached directly at (416) 421-0051.

Ouzeri thrives on fresh approach

Marrying European fine dining with Greek cuisine, the new Ouzeri has much to offer Danforth-goers.

After purchasing the popular eatery in November '97, brothers Chris and Alex Trahiotis (whose father Jim was executive chef and partner at Burlington's famed Lord Nelson Restaurant) revamped the menu with a view to offering fewer dishes but making every dish count. "We prefer to offer fifty superb selections than a hundred good ones," says Alex. "And freshness is paramount; from field to table is our modus operandi."

A cheery, festive place with much to offer

In addition to a wide variety of Greek appetizers, you'll find a few intriguing entrées available nowhere else on the Danforth. Signature dishes include the wonderfully garnished and baked Oysters Ouzeri; Chicken Parmesan; and Breaded Chicken with Wine Mushroom or Lemon Butter Sauce.

Fresh fish is available daily, and may feature Salmon, Pickerel, Rainbow Trout, or whatever catch happens to be freshest on the day you visit.

Accompany these delectables with a fine wine from Ouzeri's extensive international list and you have all the ingredients of a culinary bonanza.

Ouzeri is a cheery, festive place, especially on Tuesday nights when live Greek music plays to the wee hours. Its patio ranks among the Danforth's largest and liveliest, and the sightlines both within and without are clean. If you're a people watcher, Ouzeri is unparalleled — not only on the Danforth, but city-wide.

The service is friendly and extremely thorough, with ample wait staff to keep pace with your needs. The dining environment is immaculate, the cuisine impeccable. If you haven't visited Ouzeri recently, perhaps now is the time.

Fresh ideas, Mussels and much more

Amid the wave of new restaurant openings, periodically a gem emerges: a small, unassuming place with big ideas and the moxy to carry them off without fanfare.

Mussels Grill on Danforth will intrigue and gratify the most demanding mussel afficionado, but those who look beyond the name will find a rare variety of other inspired preparations.

Proprietors John and Tabitha Jackson haven't reinvented the wheel, but they've certainly added a spoke or two. Operating from the premise that quality ingredients, careful preparation and friendly service are not an end but a beginning, head chef Darl McCallum notes that "fresh ideas matter as much as fresh ingredients". Breaking shopworn rules with festivity and flair, he draws the very best out of fresh vegetables and herbs, seafood, and organic, grain-fed meat. If environmental concerns rank ex aequo with your palate, Mussels will confirm what you already know: fresh — and organic — tastes better.

Starting suggestions include the peppered rocket sandwich, a symphony of flavors with arugula lettuce, smoked salmon, horseradish cultured cream, potato crisps and fresh herbs on a potato pancake base. The appetizer platter, for two guests or more, offers assorted tastings which change daily.

Mussels' carnivore, vegetarian and seafood platters, created to encourage sharing among guests, have played to rave reviews since opening night; they're accompanied by fanciful dipping sauces, starches and greenery.

This menu does more than merely aspire to innovate. Witness its new, must-try take on lamb — eureka! — organic Ontario lamb chops grilled with drunken gooseberry-lavender jelly, served with chef's choice of starch and vegetables. Other good news: crisp supreme breast of free range Canadian chicken "qued", over Freelton baby reds and charred harvest veggie salad; skin-seared Bay of Fundy salmon over greens, with grilled rice cake, chervil, yellow tomato and cracked pepper vinaigrette.

If red meat is your preference, try the certified Canadian Black Angus striploin with seasonal vegetable medley, whipped Yukon golds, rosemary scented ring and hot house fungus. The wine list is well-priced, and offers many local and imported vintages.

Among the seven varieties of mussels on the menu, the "flash 'n' pan" — with saffron, five cut vegetables, and cream — remain etched in memory, as do the French (vermouth, tarragon, spinach and white wine).

Mussels makes its own desserts too: fresh fruit scintillates in an ever-changing selection from chocolate to cheesecake.

The decor, with its warm, solid colors and snow-white table linen, is the essence of hospitable, refined simplicity. The patio, small and friendly, echoes the restaurant's casual yet elegant ambience.

What's in a name? In Mussels' case, much more than promised. It's a wonderful discovery.

Astoria's souvlaki judged best in major media polls

Think "Danforth", and you're liable to think "Astoria." In the 21 years since it opened, this venerable "institution of higher dining" has come to symbolize the culinary qualities the Danforth is known for: great food, great quality, and great value.

Indeed, many of Astoria's original customers are still regulars two decades later, and wouldn't dream of going anywhere else.

Astoria's now-famous "souvlaki window", always a beehive of activity, is an indelible image of Danforth life. And what souvlaki! Judged "Best of the City" by Toronto Life and "Best of Toronto" by Now Magazine, Astoria's souvlaki helped make it a multiple winner of the Toronto Sun's Readers' Choice Award as Toronto's favourite Greek restaurant. Other jewels on the menu include hearty moussaka, exquisite broiled sea bass and salmon steaks – and Greek appetizers like grilled kalamari and grilled octopus, if you can keep your souvlaki craving at bay long enough to sample them.

Location and atmosphere are other Astoria assets. For a big restaurant, it's remarkably cozy, due to its corner location, dual outdoor patios (the Danforth's largest), and quiet, richly appointed interior.

Heading eastbound on Bloor, you know you're on the Danforth once you hit Broadview; but you don't really feel it until Astoria's white facade with its pale blue trim leaps joyously into view, bidding you "Welcome to the Danforth" in words that the food lover in you understands so well.

Octavia: Greek and much more revive fond Memories

The more things change, the more they stay the same. The earth is still turning on its axis, the sun still rises in the East — and Tom Konis is still cooking up memorable dishes.

If you treasure your Memories of fine dining on Eglinton, the present-day Octavia will rekindle and redefine your appetite for innovative cuisine.

With a culinary legacy that includes tenure at Julie's Mansion, La Scala and the Hotel Plaza II — in addition to his 15 years as owner and chef of Memories — Tom Konis boasts a glittering résumé. So it's not surprising that in three short years, Octavia has become one of the Danforth's most popular restaurants. With partner Tom Athanasopoulos, son John Konis and a caring staff, Tom has made Octavia a prime dining destination. Lineups are common, especially on weekends, thanks to a city-wide reputation for superb cuisine that defies stereotyping.

While Octavia excels at traditional Greek cuisine (their roast leg of lamb is unparalleled), they also shine in other areas. For example, their U.S. choice New York steak now ranks #1 among many Toronto steak lovers and would be the envy of any steak house. Fresh sea bass and red snapper are broiled whole with impeccable timing: quickly seared to seal in the juices, then gently cooked and removed at the precise moment they reach peak flavour.

Under the watchful eye of chef and partner Tom Konis, Octavia sets a high standard for cuisine, service and comfort

Tom's Baby Back Ribs are the stuff of legend; the recipe originated some 45 years ago in the kitchen of Julie's Mansion. The crispy Roast Duck, lovingly cooked in fresh orange juice, Cointreau and Grand Marnier, is positively euphoric. Want a pasta dish unlike any you've ever tried? The papardelle — fresh flat noodles sautéed with shrimps & scallops in Pernaud — is both Italian and Chinese, yet neither; it's simply a great dish.

After dinner, Octavia puts on its lounge hat and serves up some of Toronto's finest martinis. Dessert martinis are a specialty; among others, the espresso martini will put an exclamation point on your evening. And, unlike some establishments which merely encourage you to relax after dinner, Octavia's built for relaxation. Its intimate, plush semicircular booths evoke a Roaring Twenties elegance, while its stylish serpentine bar reminds you that you're very much in the year 2000.

The Octavia difference, so apparent in the cuisine, is also exemplified by the warm greeting you'll receive from John Konis when you enter. This is a family business in the best sense of the term; the Konises and their staff don't merely work the business, they live it. The spirit of service is ever-present; the singular focus of John and other members of the Octavia team is to ensure that both your meal and your visit are memorable.

Notwithstanding Octavia's soaring popularity, Tom Konis pledges never to lose sight of his commitment to customer satisfaction. "It's not how many customers you serve, it's how well you serve the customers you have."

Healthy choices at expanded Big Carrot

From humble beginnings in 1983, The Big Carrot has grown into metropolitan Toronto's largest health food store and wholistic dispensary. A recent major expansion means there's even more of The Big Carrot to nurture your health.

Run as a co-op since its opening, The Big Carrot caters to a loyal clientele that embraces both its ethos and its products: minimally processed, organically grown, cruelty free, environmentally safe and, increasingly, GMO-free. As it happens, many of these products are also Kosher.

Health-conscious customers seek out The Big Carrot for its extensive organic fruit and vegetable department (over 100 varieties at peak season) and its unmatched selection of organic bulk foods, dairy products, frozen foods, and packaged goods.

While most health food stores carry a few brands of a particular item, The Big Carrot often has half a dozen or more, and their well-versed staff is more than happy to help you decide which products will suit your dietary needs and your palate. If it's wheat-free — if it's dairy-free — if it's simply good for you, The Big Carrot undoubtedly has it.

The vast product selection includes a staggering variety of breads, buns, fresh-daily brick-oven bagels, flatbreads, and bread sticks — many of them wheat-free and dairy-free.

The Big Carrot has by far Toronto's largest selection of soy milks and other non-dairy beverages, both fresh and tetra-pac. Ditto for wholesome natural cookies, muffins, and other baked goods.

Among many others, the Kosher products include Crofters jams from Ontario; Green Chef frozen veggie dogs and burgers from kibbuts Elion in Israel; Barbet fruit syrups from Israel; tetra-pac dairy-free soups (the ultimate in convenience) from Imagine; cereals from Nature's Path; Zaidy's breads; Jersey Farm non-dairy soy yogurt; Organic Meadow yogurt and pressed cottage cheese; Barbara's fig bars; a wide selection of Eden organic pastas and tomato sauces; and Van's frozen waffles. The body care department carries Kosher essential oils from Pure-Li Natural.

Body Care, in fact, is typical of the Big Carrot difference. Large enough to constitute a store in its own right, this newly enlarged department boasts Canada's widest selection of personal care products for the entire family, including baby.

But don't let The Big Carrot's size fool you. Through its continuing expansion, it has retained the humility and friendliness of its early years. This is a store that's down to earth in every possible sense, and a real pleasure to visit.

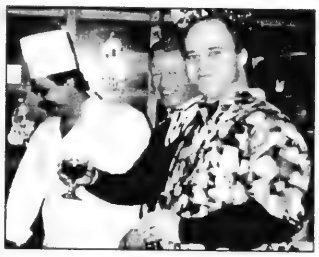
Palace "steaks" reputation on quality

At The Palace, every meal is a special occasion; owner/operator Peter Hadjis makes sure of it. From the moment you enter, you're treated like royalty — a feeling that's confirmed and enhanced with each and every bite.



A quick perusal of the Palace's menu reveals a selection of royal fare unmatched on the Danforth. The appetizers alone provide more choice than some entire menus, and they stand alone in terms of freshness, preparation and authenticity.

The Palace's culinary appeal is not limited to Greek cuisine; their steak, for example, is so popular that many of their customers specifically ask for it when making reservations. The Palace's Sterling Silver Certified Premium Beef is world-famous for consistently superior flavour, tenderness, and juiciness. Each steak, as well as prime rib, is hand-selected, aged 21 days, and comes with its own guarantee. Awarded the Gold Medal by "Chefs of North America", it is available in an assortment of cuts including Tenderloin, Rib-Eye and New York strip.

The Palace is also highly reputed for its fresh fish; try the grilled swordfish steak with garlic mashed potatoes, and ask yourself whether you've ever tasted anything better. Fresh sea bass, rainbow trout, red snapper, Atlantic salmon, filet of sole — whatever your preference, you'll find it here, prepared to the absolute maximum of its flavour. It's easy to see why the Palace is the favourite spot of discriminating fish lovers.

As befits a Palace, there's a private Party room for up to 100 people. Located on the skylit upper level, it's ideal for birthday parties, Bar/Bat Mitzvah parties, or any event requiring the kind of ambience a banquet hall simply can't provide.

Not so much a restaurant as a culinary kingdom unto itself, the Palace "steaks" its reputation on quality.

Sushi delight lives up to its name

If you're a Japanese food lover who also loves the Danforth, your ship has come in. Sushi Delight offers a wonderful taste of the rising sun in a bright, immaculate setting. The variety is spectacular, the prices extremely modest; and the namesake item (tasty morsels of uncooked fish on delicious beds of rice) will serenade your taste buds as few other delicacies can.

Complete meals, in a Bento box and served with soup, salad, rice and dessert, range from $6.95 for the Vegetarian Box, which includes tempura, to $11.95 for the Tokyo Box, which includes sushi.

Equally tasty are the large selection of sashimi (morsels of seafood or meat) and makimono (seaweed or rice rolls, with a seafood or vegetable core). The beef sashimi, lightly roasted on the outside, is rare inside, offering two flavours and textures in each bite.

Dip these tidbits in sharp, invigorating wasabi mustard and soya sauce, and you'll feel the pleasure reverberate within your very soul!

The miso soup features succulent shitake mushrooms in light broth, with a choice of udon or soba noodles. Udon, made from rice, are broad; soba, made from whole wheat. are narrow.

The tempura is another traditional Japanese offering you'll enjoy at Sushi Delight. Diverse ingredients like shrimp and broccoli are wrapped in flour, immersed in ice to chill, then deep fried. The texture is crisp, the taste mouthwatering. Or you may prefer chicken, salmon or beef teppanyaki, flame-cooked at your table.

The light Asahi beer is ideal with dinner at the end of a warm summer day. The smooth warmth of a more traditional Japanese beverage — heated sake (rice wine) — forms a pleasing counterpoint to the tangy coolness of sushi, sashimi or makimono.

Even ice cream comes under the Oriental influence here. Amazingly refreshing, the green tea variety is like mint, but more tart, while the red bean ice cream is full-flavoured and richly textured.

Sushi Delight uses only the freshest ingredients, and is 100% MSG-free. Every bite fulfills the needs of good health as well as the desire for good taste.

Proprietor Billy Li is involved, heart and soul, in every aspect of Sushi Delight. The chef, Billy's brother Chun, is likewise devoted to his craft. Service is friendly and cheerful, and children are welcome. The bright, uplifting setting maintains the aura of delicacy seemingly intrinsic to Japanese culture. The dishes, in their great variety, are as attractive to the eye as to the palate.

Sushi Delight is further evidence of the Danforth's diverse international flavour, and well worth a visit by anyone wishing to explore Japanese cuisine or further their existing love affair with it.

Ampeli: vintage cuisine, exotic origins

Southern Mediterranean cuisine encompasses many geographic traditions; Ampeli, a warm, expansive addition to the Danforth, brings together Portuguese, Spanish, southern Italian and Greek influences in a medley of flavours ranging from light to hearty.

"Ampeli" is Greek for "vineyard"; accordingly, partners Tony Nina and Paul Vouzas take pains to ensure that each Mediterranean vintage on their wine list harmonizes with the menu. Even the non-European wines here are based on European grapes.

Drawing on 20 years of Danforth experience, Chef Louis Kripouris boasts a broad repertoire. In particular, he does wonders with fish, be it whiting or striped bass, porgy or snapper. It's all fresh daily, the best of the catch, complemented well by crisp Vinho Verde white wine. One of his prize creations is a healthy, melt-in-your-mouth portion of fresh char-grilled Atlantic salmon. Enjoy the contrast of its rich taste with any of several dry red wines.

Finally, a new way to enjoy chicken: Churrasco, or "Butterfly Chicken", a dish of Portuguese origin. Ironstone Obsession white wine, its ideal accompaniment, also goes wonderfully with fish, or on its own. Fresh Ontario lamb chops and weekly roast lamb specials partner with Hatzimichalis Cabernet reds, or the "La Palma", which one of Canada's foremost wine critics recently chose for his wedding.

The mixed grill platter, made to order from several different items, allows you to sample a broad spectrum of tastes — and wines to match — without limiting yourself to any one in particular. There's also a fine variety of lunch items, appetizers, salads, pastas and pizzas. For dessert, the chocolate fudge cake, cappuccino cheese cake and super caramel crunch are always crowd-pleasers; they're best enjoyed with a glass of port.

Ampeli's shady, spacious patios afford cool relief from the summer sun. Relax here with a glass or carafe of Delta Bay red or white wine. The equally spacious interior is bright but gently lit, with cool tiled floors.

Ampeli is ideally suited for couples or groups of four to six who wish to share pleasure in fine fare and vintages. Larger groups are also welcome for family and corporate events.

Located about halfway between Pape and Chester, Ampeli enjoys gustatory proximity to each of the aforementioned European countries. Accompanied by the appropriate vintage, each dish on the menu will transport you to the destination of your choice.

Christina's: from cravings to star gazing

Some define a restaurant merely by its ability to satisfy their food cravings. For others, ambience is paramount. Still others insist on live entertainment. A few even like to gaze at the stars (either the celebrity or the celestial variety). It's rare to find one place that combines all of these attributes; but for many Torontonians, Christina's is that place.

Food cravings. In addition to traditional Greek fare — including the best plate of lamb chops you'll find on the Danforth — Christina's solves your Greek/Italian culinary dichotomies by offering wonderful pasta/souvlaki combos. Their filet of sole in a killer garlic sauce is a must-try. And their treatment of salads (romaine and organic baby green lettuce are used instead of leaf and iceberg) is typical of a menu-wide provision of quality ingredients. This is not a fast-food restaurant; you may wait a little longer for your food to arrive, but the wait is well worth it.

Ambience. Christina's has Character with a capital "C". Much of that character, of course, comes from the clientele, which echoes Christina's universal appeal; on any given night, you'll find almost as many ethnicities and walks of life as there are patrons.

Live entertainment. Live music and belly dancing are offered on Friday and Saturday night, but the best show is the spontaneous conversation that seems to spread from table to table like wildfire.

Star gazing. Toronto's original late-night spot, Christina's is still open until 4 or 5 a.m. on busy nights, and many entertainment celebrities gravitate to it. Recent sightings include Kristey Alley, Tony Danza, and Alicia Silverstone of "Batgirl" fame. Those who prefer gazing at the "Big Dipper" will find that Christina's patio, while not the largest on the Danforth, is certainly the most popular; come early if you want to grab a strategic spot.

A Danforth institution most definitely run by the inmates, Christina's is a crazy, wonderful place; until you've done it, you haven't really done the Danforth.

Ice cream heaven at Uncle Louie G's

Close your eyes and picture yourself as a child, ice cream cone in hand. Remember its inimitable taste, and how it thrilled you with pleasure.

Open your eyes again, and you're liable to find yourself at Uncle Louie G's, reliving that same taste sensation. This brand new Danforth parlour represents everything ice cream should be: made the old-fashioned way, without additives or preservatives, packed with pure natural flavour. Its Brooklyn, N.Y. creator, Rick Russo, also credits the generous use of key ingredients for his product's success: "We got this popular because we decided to use twice as many chips, nuts, berries, cream as anyone else, and still sell at a reasonable ... price." [New York Daily News].

UNCLE LOUIE G'S
ORIGINAL NEW YORK ICES & ICE CREAM
"The coolest lick in town!"
451 Danforth Ave.
462-9537

Catrina Gibson, Fani Constas and her husband Emmanuel, who sourced out the product, were hooked when they visited Uncle Louie G's factory in Brooklyn. "I'd always liked ice cream, but this was by far the best I'd ever tasted," says Gibson. "As I stood and watched people peeling bananas and strawberries by hand, I knew this was the kind of product I'd be proud to sell."

The partners' involvement led them to open Canada's first Uncle Louie G's, and early signs point to a duplication of the lineups experienced by the original store on Coney Island Avenue in Brooklyn. While the latter now supplies over 50 retail outlets in the U.S. and has a concession at Shea Stadium, the Canadian partners have the sole distribution and franchising rights for Canada.

Uncle Louie G's natural ices and ice creams come in a cavalcade of 60 flavours — always in store — many of which seem to emanate from your own personal food fantasies. For example, there's Apple Pie and Pumpkin Pie Ice Cream, made with real chunks of fresh pie. Ditto for Strawberry Cheesecake and Pineapple Cheesecake Ice Cream. For real Italian flavour, there's Tartoni Ice Cream and Dolce Ice Cream, made with scalded milk. Ices? Try the Mango or the Honeydew Melon for a refreshing summer treat.

"Everything we sell is made from natural ingredients, the same way your mother or grandmother would make it at home," says Gibson. "We don't use shortcuts."

In addition to their current variety of ices, ice creams and milkshakes, Uncle Louie G's plans to offer ice cream cakes, hot waffles, and other gourmet items in the near future, to be enjoyed in store or out.

From floor to ceiling, the shop is gleefully awash in bright pastel colours — yellow, green, blue, and pink — and brimming with goodies. It's a great place to relive your childhood innocence with favourite old flavours and a bevy of intriguing new ones.

Functional fashion & gear at Destination danforth

Pick the most functional garments you've ever owned. Select the most convenient features of each. Then combine these features in a single "dream garment" that adapts, chameleon-like, to any activity, social setting or weather report.

Far-fetched? Maybe not. Most items at Destination Danforth have the intrinsic functionality of a Swiss Army knife, with fewer moving parts. Long pants that zip off to become shorts. Shorts that become long pants. Jackets that fold up to fit into a zip pocket. Quick-dry shirts. Quick-dry underwear. (Don't ask!) Pre-shrunk stuff that miraculously shrinks even further so that you can tuck it into a side pocket. Rainwear. Reflective gear. Cool mesh wear. Bug jackets and pants for summer. Polar fleece pajamas and sleeping bags for winter. Swimsuits with built-in key chains. Short of reattaching your umbilical cord, Destination Danforth has the gear and gadgets to prepare you for any and every situation.

Catering extensively to the film and travel trades, Destination Danforth is a boon to men and women on the move who need to change, Bond-like, without losing a beat and without sacrificing comfort. According to owner Sarah Fishman, many of her customers also value the health benefits which derive from natural fibres and/or space-age construction. "Many items in the store are anti-microbial and don't absorb odour," she notes. Likewise, many are designed to retain body heat in winter and wick away perspiration in summer; a terrific selection of fleece socks will allow you to enjoy the ultimate in foot comfort year-round. The shop carries a multitude of sturdy cotton garments that are extremely breathable and non-itchy.

Destination Danforth caters to all tastes and budgets with a large selection of quality lines in a wide range of colours and price points. Featuring Kaid, Columbia, Wetskins, Royal Robbins, Mac & Jac, Misty Mountain, Elita, Mod Robes, North 49, Rockwater Design, and other top brand names, they also offer the expertise and personal service you'll need to choose the right items — unless you're a functional clothing "veteran", like the film types who zip in and out faster than you can say "Cut!" and "Print!"

In addition to clothing, Destination Danforth also offers some unbelievably cool collapsible furniture. Says Fishman, "Our customer is anyone who wants to get the most out of any situation with the least fuss and the least possible baggage."

Fringe performer deserves mainstream spotlight

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Alon Nashman is a new, relatively undiscovered, Jewish dramatic star in Toronto.

His superb performance in Alphonse in an outdoor venue of the Fringe Festival at the Bloor Jewish Community Centre adds lustre to an already proven career in alternative theatre.

In the Theaturtle production he directed, tailored to an audience of children and adults – with the kids up front sitting in small chairs – Nashman brilliantly executed the award-winning one-man play by Wajdi Mouawad, of Quebec, translated from the French by Shelley Tepperman.

It's a play about a boy's rich imagination and his ability to tell stories which adults, hurrying fretfully from one task to another, have lost the ability to understand.

Playing 28 different characters, Nashman improvises when the children yell out their reactions to his actions. He uses a safety rope to swing from one part of the set to another in answer to one of their challenges.

His costume changes in a giant, nylon tube have the audience in conniptions. His voice and mannerisms change with each character.

The blue sky above and the trees all around are used by the actor in telling his stories; nevertheless, he enhanced them by wonderful scenes from Pastryberg, the country to which Alphonse was headed to rescue the recipes for cakes stolen by a villainous duke. Imagine France without cakes for its children!

The main stage theatres are missing a bet if they don't put Alphonse on their list.

Amy Marschak, of Colorado, plays a Jewish woman, a victim of incest when she was young, in the autobiographical tale, An Angel Cried a Tear Last Night. It is part of the Fringe Festival at the Glen Morris Theatre.

Alon Nashman

As the writer and lone performer, she skewers several aspects of society, particularly those people who insist that the victims should not reveal their "secret" to the world.

But she saves some salvoes for rabbis who give long, sleep-inducing sermons and for her own congregation, which does not even notice that she has fallen asleep on the pulpit after reading from the Torah at her own bat mitzvah.

She wins the audience to her side – the memory of the incest is strong. Her conversations with her parents, her uncle and her cousin, reveal a society which does not, or doesn't want to, understand the torments of a sensitive soul like Marschak.

She ends with the Hebrew prayer, Shehechianu, giving thanks for her belated discovery that indeed it was her father who was the guilty one. She leaves her parents' home for the last time, feeling safe because she is with friends. The weakness in the play is that she does not explain who these friends are, leading to an overly abrupt ending.

The precarious role of the Jew in a society where no cultural diversity is allowed is clear in Monolith, a Fringe Festival play written and directed by 24-year-old Hart Massey of Toronto.

Monolith is a fictional country, home to the world's only survivors on an island after an earthquake.

Two Jewish rebels, played by Jewish actors Eli Cohen, formerly of Israel, and Rob Sternberg of Toronto, head an underground movement to bring faith back into peoples' lives. They are betrayed by a Colombian woman (Juana Awad, co-founder of the producing theatre company), a recent immigrant to Monolith.

She has been beaten by the police chief (Jeff Pestell) and his Chinese assistant (Otto Cheng) in order to force her betrayal.

Both policemen play their roles well. But, the same cannot be said for the Jewish rebels who have trouble with their entrances and exits. Sternberg's vacillation between his desire to find his roots in Judaism and his employment by the Monolith police blurs the focus of the play.

There is a passing reference to Israel by Cohen who says the Law of Return failed because the European Jews who flocked to Israel after its founding did not acknowledge their differences.

Massey told The CJN that he wrote the play to encourage directors to employ actors of ethnic origin.

"I have the impression that the Toronto theatre world is made up of white authors and white actors," he said.

Actor brings 'humanity' to killer's role

By ADAM SEGAL
CJN Intern

TORONTO — Playing the role of a vicious killer requires the meticulous study of the criminal mind, says actor Aaron Philip Berg, who stars as Bernardo in Canadian playwright George Walker's classic Zastrozzi the Master of Discipline.

"I had to get to the root of what drives a serial murder to kill people in order… to bring humanity to the character," says the 27 year-old former Mr. Canada.

This tale of revenge and tragedy juxtaposes good and evil as Zastrozzi, Europe's notorious mass murderer, and his right-hand man Bernardo pursue "holier than thou" Verezzi, the man responsible for the rape of Zastrozzi's mother.

Although the characters have starkly different personalities, Berg notes, "it is difficult for them to exist without one another. That sense of relativity truly shows you can't have good without evil."

Berg, who enjoys reading about Jewish history and recently started studying the Kabbalah, juggles a busy schedule that includes rehearsals, stand-up gigs, two-hour daily workouts and occasional spots in feature films.

He is eagerly awaiting the release of The Ladies Man this October, in which he plays Saturday Night Live star Will Ferrell's wrestling coach.

Acting alongside improv-savvy performers like Ferrell and Tim Meadows was a real thrill for Berg.

"It was a very off-the-wall set," he says. "I take the craft of acting seriously, but after every scene I couldn't help but be in tears from laughter."

Aaron Philip Berg

Berg is intrigued by the "grandeur" of feature filmmaking, but continues to find theatre rewarding.

"The beauty of going on stage is that you'll always have a rehearsal process… which allows so much room for discovery and exploration of the role and the story itself."

The Toronto native feels comfortable acting in his home-town, but finds the lure of Hollywood tempting. "Toronto is a great town to gather experience, playing small roles in big productions, but everyone who's made it big has done what you have to do, which is go down [to Hollywood]."

Zastrozzi the Master of Discipline will be at the Poor Alex Theatre for one week, starting on Aug. 2. For tickets call 416-324-9863.

Mark Weinstock: Minstrel man

By JOYCE SINGER-D'APRILE
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Journalists meet many fascinating folks, but occasionally an interview resonates as a personal favourite. Such was the case recently, when I met Mark Weinstock, a young musician who serenaded me in my living room.

He's only in his early 20s and already this local bard has travelled extensively. He's lived and performed in exotic places, (solo or with a band), and he's just cut his first CD, Mark's Patchwork.

"We had two CD launches in Toronto as we decided to celebrate twice with two concerts. It was wonderful. There was a different energy level at each concert, so we're really happy we did that," he says.

Now he's hoping to take it on the road to expand his fan base. Haunting instrumentals are the highlight of the CD. This singer-songwriter is tremendously proficient with several eclectic instruments from around the world including the Tarbukah (Israel); Didgeridoo (Australia); Kalimba (Africa); Bamboo flute (India); Pan flutes (Ecuador); Reed pipes (Egypt); and Tibetan bells.

"I love to travel. In Australia, I didn't mean to play. I didn't even bring my guitar. I showed up at a cabaret, I borrowed a guitar, and they squeezed me in. It was a great crowd, of a few hundred people. So I played some songs and then I discovered I won – and I didn't even know it was a contest!"

He learned how to make his own didgeridoo from a local master, and began getting gigs in Australia.

"Whenever I travel I try to learn an instrument that's indigenous to the place where I'm visiting," he says. "For me it's like a toy. I definitely have respect for it. But it's like when kids play with toys, the more they play the better they get. Piano and guitar are my primary instruments, but I love percussion instruments."

He called the CD Mark's Patchwork because of the different musicians he plays with. "While I write and compose everything, I play with different musicians. I have a Toronto-based band. But when I travel, I'll hook up with my favourite local musicians wherever I am, and ask them to listen to my songs. And if we connect, I'll perform with them."

Not every adventure he's had was a pleasure ride. He loved staying in Israel, but one day everything stopped cold in the streets, as a bus bomb went off on a bus ahead of the one in which he was travelling. He says it was the end of a time of innocence for him, inspiring some profound songs for his repertoire.

"I've played heavy rock to bluegrass. In the last five years I've really found my own voice."

In high school, Mark discovered his natural affinity for music, and his future vocation. His "folky nature" evolved with receptive audiences, which he found incredibly encouraging. As a result he began telling stories at these concerts.

"Lyrically my inspiration comes from the great storytellers of a few decades ago," he says, "like Robert Hunter or Joni Mitchell and others who say something very sincere, rather than something that just sounds nice."

His vocals reflect the Bob Dylan/Leonard Cohen genre. It will be fascinating to observe the continuing maturation process of Weinstock's intensely heartfelt lyrics and evocative music.

To order a copy of his debut CD Mark's Patchwork, call toll-free 1-877-FOR-MY-CD (1-877-367-6923). Net surfers can log on to www.markspatchwork.com to surf his personal Web site.

Evening belonged to young chazzan

By MORDECHAI BEN-DAT

TORONTO — In a real sense, it was the young chazzan's official introduction into his new community.

Celebrating his first anniversary as the cantor of Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Synagogue in North York, Ont., Aaron Bensoussan recently hosted a trio of eminent chazzanim from Israel along with his predecessor, now chazzan emeritus of the synagogue, Louis Danto, in an evening titled Sweet Song.

Joining Bensoussan and Danto were cantors Chaim Adler, the chief cantor of Tel Aviv, Arie Braun, the chief cantor of the Israel Defence Forces and Naftali Herstik, senior cantor of Hechal Shlomo, the Great Synagogue in Jerusalem.

Together, they entertained the overflowing sanctuary of appreciative cantorial enthusiasts with two hours of musical festivity.

The evening began with a rousing rendition by the entire ensemble of the familiar Shehechianu blessing. Braun carried the melody, his deep voice in front of all the others, leading them as if on a military parade.

The positive energy among the five distinguished singers was a treat to behold; they enthusiastically maintained the pace and the flow throughout the entire 19-song concert.

In terms of its sheer volume, Braun's voice was the most powerful. His baritone-bass sound was formidable. When he sang the Adon Olam medley, the sound was almost tangible, like layers of waves rolling out toward the audience.

Herstik's voice, more baritone than tenor, was impressively effective when he sang the Yiddish folksong, Sluzk Mayn Shtetele. In response to the intricacies of the arrangement, his voice ranged between robustly assertive to softly caressing. He demonstrated the same masterful control in the upper register as he did in the lower.

Adler's voice was true tenor. It soared. At times it seemed to fill the room. When he sang the traditional Retzei, he plunged full force into the daunting challenge of the upper reaches of the music.

He achieved a spellbinding tour de force in the song Dos Yiddishe Lied. It was an emotional, touching showcase for three tunes from the High Holy Day liturgy.

The selections by Louis Danto, Ezkera and Avremele Melamed, were the most musically challenging and technically difficult. Danto's classical training was put to good use and he especially pleased the audience with his energetic operatic offering of Leoncavallo's Mattinata.

Though he didn't sing more solos than his colleagues, the evening really "belonged" to Aaron Bensoussan. This was his Toronto debut as cantorial host to world-renowned fellow cantors. It was in his honour that his Israeli guests joined him warmly and convivially on the bimah at his new professional home. His happiness, humility and deference to his colleagues were evident throughout the evening.

Born some four decades ago in the seaport Moroccan town of Mogodor, Bensoussan came to North America as a teenager. Into his soul have been poured a trans-ethnic brew of vastly diverse but spiritually complementary religious influences. From that brew, he has imbibed deeply; its expansive effect has shaped his unique "hybrid" Jewish character.

Bensoussan's grandfather, Rabbi Haim Bensoussan, was the chief rabbi of Morocco. Yet, in the United States, the young cantor-to-be studied at the quintessentially Ashkenazi Lithuanian Telsher Yeshiva in Chicago. He received his formal cantorial and musical training at Queen's College, Yeshiva University Belz School of Music and at the Jewish Theological Seminary.

In its sound and range, Bensoussan's tenor voice is reminiscent of that of the Israeli songster Yehoram Gaon. Like Gaon, Bensoussan sings with a joyful pleasantness and a sunny spontaneity.

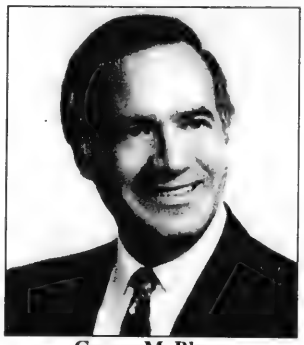
Canadian Lake Carriers Association



Casper M. Bloom

Mr. Gerald Carter, Chairman of the Board of Canadian Lake Carriers Association, is pleased to announce the appointment of Casper M. Bloom, Q.C., as President and Chief Executive Officer of the Canadian Lake Carriers Association (CLCA).

Mr. Bloom comes to the CLCA after 33 years of active practice with the law firm of Ogilvy Renault where he was a senior partner specializing in the field of labour and employment law and where he continues to serve as counsel. He holds a Bachelor of Arts Degree in Economics and Political Science from McGill University, a Master's of Business Administration from the University of Western Ontario and a Licence in Law from the Université de Montréal.

The CLCA is an association of maritime shipping companies with offices in Quebec and Ontario, with responsibility for providing advice, information and assistance to its member companies with respect to all matters concerning labour and industrial relations in the shipping industry as well as responsibility for conducting collective bargaining on.their behalf.

The member companies of the Association are involved primarily in inland shipping, that is, in the Great Lakes — St. Lawrence system between Canadian ports and in import and export trades with American inland ports.

SUMMER LITERARY COLUMN —PART I

Some years ago, Syracuse University Press (SUP) launched an ambitious publication series called the Library of Modern Jewish Literature. The roughly two dozen handsome hardcover volumes produced to date, include numerous works by critic-novelist Cynthia Ozick and representations by other celebrated writers such as Arthur Miller, S. Y. Agnon and Ludwig Lewisohn.

Eye on Arts
By Bill Gladstone

One of the chief benefits of such a project, it would seem, would be to put lesser-known writers into the limelight. SUP achieved this purpose admirably in the case of Warsaw-born Yiddish writer Yehuda Elberg of Montreal.

Elberg's two wonderful novels, The Ship of the Hunted and The Empire of Kalman the Cripple, were presented in English translation a couple of years back. Both books drew immense critical praise, and the Globe and Mail, without a grain of hyperbole, dubbed Elberg "a literary master living among us."

More recently, SUP presented English translations of two Yiddish novels by another great but little-known Canadian, Chava Rosenfarb. A survivor of the Lodz ghetto, Rosenfarb came to Montreal after the war, and moved to Toronto two years ago. Her books, Bociany and Of Lodz And Love, present a rich tapestry of pre-Holocaust life in, respectively, the shtetl of Bociany (the name means "stork" in Polish) and the booming, industrial city of Lodz.

The novels examine Jewish-Christian relations and the growing trends towards socialism, Zionism, secularism and Polish nationalism; in short, the transition from Jewish village life to modernism.

Rosenfarb, who years ago won Israel's esteemed Manger Prize for Yiddish Literature, deserves a wider audience. Despite the present revival, Yiddish will likely not recover its former position as the language of the Jewish masses.

One hopes SUP might eventually bring out popularly priced paperback editions of its library. Each of the four translated works named above costs more than $40, which means that they may be accessible to the mind but not necessarily the pocketbook.

When SUP brought out Elberg's two volumes a few years back, the 85-year-old proudly announced, "I am the father of twins." Now, at 88, he is expecting triplets, having readied the translations of three Yiddish books for publication in English. Their titles are: A Man Is But A Man, A World Unto Itself and A Ladder to Heaven. Each consists of a novelette and a variety of short stories.

My impression as a reader is that Elberg's writing stands up very well against the work of great writers like Isaac B. Singer and Chaim Grade, his senior contemporaries, who moved in the same circles he did. Like Singer, Elberg acknowledges being strongly influenced by Fyodor Dostoyevsky, the great late-19th-century Russian psychological writer.

"I think Dostoyevsky made me a writer," Elberg says. "Reading him, I got the desire to do the same thing." His own books, he says, are more character studies than plot-driven formulations. "The first thing I do is to create the characters," he says. "The story develops by itself as I go on."

As for publishers, Elberg hasn't chosen any as yet, though several have expressed strong interest. One of his concerns, he says, is that the price of the finished product stays within popular range.

As much as that is an admirable goal, we hope that Elberg's triplets arrive safely, sometime soon.

* * *

Watch for more literary musings in Part II of this column, next week.

Cantors shine at overflowing shul

By fate and by design, he is a bridge between two Jewish worlds and two Jewish cultures. During services and during his concerts, he has made a point of introducing Sephardi melodies to his primarily non-Sephardi congregants and audiences.

Standing so prominently astride both nurturing Jewish cultures, Bensoussan embodies the direction in which modern chazzanut must evolve if it is to win the attention and, more importantly, the affection of the younger generation of Jews for whom the mostly lachrymose, minor-key evocations of traditional Eastern European liturgy is often, alas, impenetrable.

The symbolism of this modern transition was most poignantly captured in the rendition of Chazzanim oif Probe (The Auditioning of the Chazzanim). Cantors Herstik and Adler sang the multi-role voices of narrators, "baalebatim" and traditional chazzanim. Bensoussan sang the role of the newer, younger chazzan whose audition ultimately prevails.

Maestro Raymond Goldstein's deft piano accompaniment was an immeasurable assist to the chazzanim.

Proceeds of the concert were applied to the Ralph Snow Music Fund. Snow, an activist/philanthropist, died earlier in the year. He had been a mentor and patron for Bensoussan.

The concert was an eclectically marvellous evening both for the musical excursion it offered down memory lane and for the possibilities it suggested for the future.

Travel Talk

TWO 19TH-CENTURY INNS AND OTHER ATTRACTIONS OF THE LAKE HURON AREA

It was nearly seven o'clock on a summer's evening when I rolled into the valley of the Benmiller Inn. The sun's oblique rays were casting an exquisite, ephemeral glow onto the towering trees, dappling the rustic grounds of this former village on a river above Lake Huron, near Goderich, Ont.

The Benmiller's centre is an 1830s woolen mill of three storeys, one of five restored 19th-century buildings that feature some 54 guest rooms and several meeting spaces. I climbed the circular stairway that winds around the former mill mechanism to my suite on the second floor, preparing to be charmed. I was not disappointed.

The suite was divided into a sitting area and a sleeping area; the bed was large and comfortable. The wooden cabinets and cupboards set into the walls, and the wooden shutters over the windows established an old-fashioned tone, which the floral wallpaper happily enhanced. An inset bookshelf contained an inviting row of old books. This, I felt at once, was my kind of place.

With only an hour of good daylight remaining, I opened the shutters by the desk and composed a letter. Although I used a modern pen, the atmosphere was such that a quill and ink-pot would not have seemed inappropriate.

A walk before dinner, in the last throes of twilight, revealed a picturesque waterfall, obviously once the power source of the mill.

The refined and versatile dining-room is one of many modern conveniences offered by the inn, whose namesake, the settler Benjamin Miller, operated a grist mill and hotel here in the early 1800s. (Web site: www.benmiller.on.ca)

Goderich comes as a pleasant surprise to the first-time visitor. The civility and gentility of the town plan are immediately apparent the moment one enters the grand traffic circle, surrounded by numerous fine old storefronts, which constitute the heart of this endearing village.

The Huron County Museum is a delicious treat. The nucleus of its collection is some 4,000 artifacts, including many farm implements, acquired by Herbert Neill, a local whose donation to the county was contingent on his retention as manager of the proposed museum. He proved a brilliant, albeit eccentric, curator.

Occupying an old schoolhouse that has been substantially expanded, the museum is crammed with enticing heirlooms of history, including train locomotives and cars, reconstructed storefronts, military regalia, rare photographs and much more.

A tinkerer extraordinaire, Neill built dozens of odd contraptions and displays, each more entertaining than the next. His 1927 Essex motorcar, which he rigged with a bed before driving it across the country, is on display in the museum lobby.

The nearby Huron County Jail, built between 1839 and 1841 and now open to visitors, is an eye-opening reminder of the days when a warden's prime "behaviour modification device" was the ball-and-chain, and a prisoner's dinner consisted of oatmeal with molasses. Not to be missed.

The Little Inn of Bayfield is "the oldest operating inn in Ontario," according to its proprietors, Gayle and Pat Waters, formerly of Toronto. Once known as the Commercial Hotel, the inn was a coach stop in pre-railway days. It dates from roughly the 1830s or earlier.

The heritage building is very well kept. The Waters' have restored the former balconies around the front, restored an adjoining carriage house, added a first-rate dining room, and made many other improvements. The rooms are decorated with period furniture.

The inn is convenient to both the Blythe and Stratford theatrical festivals. Its Web site is www.littleinn.com.

Bayfield's main street is filled with colourful shops and boutiques. The town sits on a bluff above Lake Huron, whose particular meteorological situation reputedly accounts for the glorious sunsets for which the area is renown.

For further details on attractions and accommodations of the Lake Huron area, only a select few of which could be mentioned here, visit the Web site www.hurontourism.on.ca.

Piano whiz and former PM play at Brott Music Festival

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Hershey Felder, the Montreal-born piano whiz and composer who has been wowing audiences in Los Angeles and New York for years, is coming to Ontario for a musical tribute to George Gershwin, accompanied by his muse and companion, former prime minister Kim Campbell.

Felder, 31, and Campbell, 53, will present two performances of Glorious Gershwin at the Brott Music Festival, one July 29 at Hamilton's Du Maurier Centre and again the following evening at the Toronto Centre for the Arts.

Felder, a Steinway concert pianist, will join a 65-piece orchestra to perform some of Gershwin's best-known pieces, including Rhapsody in Blue, An American in Paris, Strike Up the Band and more.

He is also expected to perform Aliyah, a concert for piano and orchestra that Felder wrote for Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Barak.

As well, Felder will present a piece from the opera he and Campbell co-authored in 1997, Noah's Arc, a rumination on the Holocaust set against the biblical story of Noah.

He and Campbell collaborated on the piece during her tenure as Canada's consul general in Los Angeles. Felder, nephew of the late Rabbi Gedalia Felder of Toronto, wrote the opera after he interviewed Holocaust survivors for director Steven Spielberg's Survivors of the Shoah Visual History Foundation project. It won strong reviews after its premiere in Los Angeles.

Campbell will appear on stage as a narrator of sorts, explaining scenes and other details of Noah's Arc. In a CJN interview in 1997, Campbell said she and Felder consulted several Jewish sources in tackling the project, including rabbinic writings and kabbalah. She called herself the project's "dramaturge."

The opera is told from Noah's perspective, and raises issues surrounding moral responsibility and God's wrath.

The Gershwin project has Jewish roots too. Reportedly, Felder became interested when one of the survivors he interviewed for the Spielberg project told him he whistled Rhapsody in Blue to Nazi guards, and believed that Gershwin's music contained premonitions of a great disaster.

Felder is a hot property in Los Angeles these days with his acclaimed one-man act, George Gershwin Alone. He so impressed Gershwin's heirs that the family granted Felder exclusive rights as writer and performer to adapt the life of the legendary composer for the first time to a stage production.

In September, Felder and Campbell head to New York, where they are fielding offers from Broadway.
